Tour operator strong on Israel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Regent Holidays, a large Canadian travel wholesaler specializing in the Caribbean and Greece, has added Israel to its list of destinations, with departures set to begin in September from Toronto and Montreal via Athens on Olympic Airways.

"Israel has been at the top of the list of destinations in which Regent wants to operate for a very long time," said Regent president Peter Linnett at a recent product launch luncheon at the Westin Harbour Castle Hotel. "We've been waiting for the right climate."

Linnett cited the recent Israel-PLO peace initiative and the talks between Israel and other Arab partners. "Our hopes have never been higher for the future," he said. "This is a happy, hopeful time."

Until now, Regent has offered Canadian travellers to Greece the opportunity to visit Israel as an add-on component to their itineraries, but has never before positioned Israel as the centrepiece of a travel package to which stopovers in Greece and Egypt may be added. There is a "strong pent-up demand" for Israel among Canadians, Linnett contends, since many have postponed visiting Israel, awaiting the positive political developments that have seemingly now started to occur.

According to the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in Canada, Regent joins a growing list of Canadian tour operators that have started marketing Israel in recent years. According to IGTO figures, 14 Canadian tour operators offered packages to Israel in 1990. Today the figure is 26 — almost double.

Israeli tourism officials are optimistic that their country, which received 2 million visitors last year, may receive 5 million or more annually by the end of the decade. According to IGTO Canada director Ruth Ben-Tzur, the first three months of 1994 have shown a healthy 15 per cent increase over the same period in 1993.

"Israel is the only place where 40 per cent of its tourists come back," she told travel agents and reporters at the Regent luncheon. "It has the highest percentage of repeater traffic of any country. Our main job is to get visitors there for the first time."

"Pent-up demand" for Regent's packages to Israel has been sufficiently high, say Regent officials, that the company was compelled to print a four-page brochure, outlining a few basic packages to Israel, in advance of the 20-page brochure that is expected to be available soon from travel agents across Canada.

The company's eight-day Highlights of the Holy Land package is available for $1,899, while the same package with an additional five nights at a Netanya beach resort costs $2,179. A 15-day Israel-Egypt package costs $2,699, while a basic fly-drive holiday costs $1,449, including a Hertz rented car but excluding accommodation. Regent officials say they are offering the lowest prices on the market, combined with high value for the dollar.

The company's bold foray into Israel is backed by the collective experience of several members of its staff, most notably Joanne Cothran, director of group sales, who has sold group travel to Israel for 13 years, and seemingly knows the market very well. Regent, she told The CJN, can help bring any sort of group to Israel, no matter what its chief interest.

"When it comes to Israel, 'groups' is the name of the game," she said. "Seventy per cent of the people who travel to Israel travel in groups. Within the Christian market, everybody goes in groups. And groups are a large percentage of the Jewish market as well, with all the federation, congress and conference business."

Clive Farmer, Regent's vice president of market development, seemed especially pleased that Israel has been added to the company's list of destinations. "Of all the places that I as a product buyer have travelled, I think I've enjoyed Israel the most," he said.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

EIN GEDI, ISRAEL — "What I want you to remember," says Daniela Cohen, a member of the Ein Gedi kibbutz, "is that 38 years ago there was nothing here except the mountain, the sky and the sea."

Cohen, who was born in Vancouver and grew up in California, came to this Dead Sea oasis 25 years ago to help build the kibbutz, which was founded by a group of 80 young and idealistic Israeli army vets. At the same time, she and her husband built a family of eight children. Today some 300 adults and nearly as many children are permanent residents.

Ein Gedi appears like a mirage in the middle of the Judean desert, a lush subtropical paradise of date and palm trees, thick green lawns, a plethora of bushes and trees — and water, precious water, everywhere. Sprinklers are going full blast on the lawns and water dribbles out of every garden hose as Cohen escorts us through the property, showing us the residences, the nursery compound, the guest units, the public dining room, the swimming pools, the large theatre.

Visitors enjoy mineral-rich mud

"And over here is a bomb shelter — please don't take a picture. Thank God we've never had to use it."

Cohen leads us into the shadow of a towering tree by the perimeter chain-link fence. There is a palm plantation in a nearby valley and, beyond that, the Judean hills that are the source of Ein Gedi's water. "The fence is electrified so that our children will not be afraid. We do this, not because of intruders, but because there are about six wild leopards in the area. The electricity won't kill them, it just gives them a shock." Some 300 ibex, a type of mountain goat, also roam the terrain, and may be seen from the highway.

Ein Gedi also boasts thermal springs, a camel farm and what Cohen says is the largest cactus garden in the Middle East. Although somewhat rocky, the Dead Sea beach at Ein Gedi is one of the country's most popular, and visitors freely enjoy bathing in the mineral-rich mud. The area also boasts a hidden waterfall, which Cohen says "is really beautiful — for me, it's as close to God as you're going to get."

Another cataract within the nearby Nahal David Nature Reserve is known as David's Waterfall, which biblical scholars have identified as the place where the youth David hid overnight from King Saul (I Samuel 24). Many ancient coins and Israel's oldest menorah were found in the area. Archaeologists have identified numerous ancient and biblical sites, including a mosaic floor bearing the names of the Jewish patriarchs along with the signs of the Zodiac. According to Cohen, the mosaic also contains a curse: "Whoever gives away the secret of Ein Gedi, may his eyes wander over the land and see only evil."

Ein Gedi's modern settlers, now in their sixties, must have kept Ein Gedi's secret, for they clearly seem blessed. "This was the border between Jordan and Israel. There were no roads here, there was nothing here. We were told that nothing was going to grow here because the soil was so salty. But the wonderful phosphates that were in the Dead Sea make everything here grow better, sweeter, faster, lovelier."

Once covered by the much-larger Dead Sea of prehistoric times, the soil formerly yielded the country's best tomatoes, and still delivers superb mangoes, palmellos and dates. The site was first settled by agriculturalists who grew crops on the mountainside between five and six thousand years ago.

Ein Gedi's main income comes from its 230 guest rooms, its well-equipped spa and its famous line of moisturizers, lotions and shampoos, known as Ahava, made with Dead Sea black mud and sold around the world.

Kibbutzniks also raise some 30,000 turkeys annually, run a commercial film development lab, and have developed a substance known as Ein Gal, which is stronger than conventional rubber and may have significant military use.

The kibbutz movement as a whole has experienced financial difficulties in recent years, and Ein Gedi, like the others, has had to be flexible and adapt with the times. But this most famous of Israel's roughly 270 kibbutzim remains an undeniable success story, a testament to the hard work and idealism of its founders. It is a spirit that lives on in Ein Gedi residents like Daniela Cohen. "For people living here," says Cohen, "everything that happens here is a miracle."

Mideast travel guides

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Tourism may well become one of the cornerstones of Mideast economies should the current peace process ripen into full maturity.

In the interval, intrepid travellers may be interested in familiarizing themselves with some of the countries in the region.

There is no better guide to start with than Middle East (Raincoast Books, $22.95), a 763-page compendium which provides a bird's eye view of the area.

Sixteen countries, including Israel and Lebanon, are profiled. All in all, a good primer.

Despite a low-grade Islamic fundamentalist revolt, tourists still flock to Egypt, the only Arab country at formal peace with Israel. And in spite of its internal problems, Sudan — Egypt's southern neighbor and Africa's biggest country — also gets its share of tourists.

To find out more about these African Muslim nations, read Egypt & the Sudan (Raincoast, $21.95), a revealing portrait of two ancient lands which offer man-made and natural wonders.

Jordan & Syria (Raincoast, $18.95) takes you to such destinations as Petra, the splendid Nabatean ruins; Wadi Rum, the exquisite desert haunt of Lawrence of Arabia; the shouk al-Hamadiyyeh, the fascinating covered market in Damascus; and the Crac des Chevaliers, the magnificent Crusader fort which no visitor should miss.

One major caveat. The discussion about Kuneitra, the town on the Golan Heights returned to Syria by Israel 20 years ago, is less than balanced.

Israeli diplomats have already visited Oman and Qatar. Jewish tourists from Israel and the Diaspora may not be too far behind.

Arab Gulf States (Raincoast, $19.95) explores these Persian Gulf principalities, as well as Kuwait, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia.

Turkey will always be an alluring place to visit. With its Ottoman palaces and mosques in Istanbul, its excavations at Troy and Ephesus and its spectacular coastlines, Turkey is a tourist's dream come true.

Read all about it in Turkey (Raincoast, $24.95), a window into its sights, culture, customs and history.

Strangely enough, Middle East leaves out Morocco, Tunisia and Libya, while including off-the-beaten-track and dangerous Afghanistan.

Trading with Israel

Meyuhas/Noy

Last month, Israel's Economic Mission to Canada, in conjunction with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto/UJA and the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, hosted an evening entitled Israel: Opportunities for Canadian Business. The turnout was impressive.

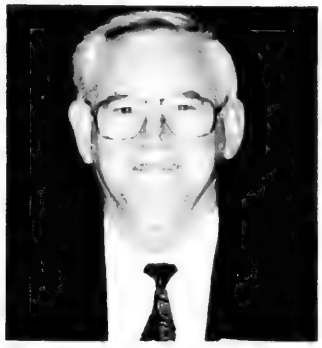
Since the September signing of the Declaration of Principles, officials from Israel say the number of inquiries from Canadian business has increased; the possibility of joint ventures is being examined; and trade relations are being cemented.

Giora Meyuhas, one of the speakers at the event, is the economic minister to North America. He is responsible for all trade/investment activities and development for North America.

Benjamin Noy is the trade commissioner of the Israel Economic Mission in Toronto.

CJN reporter Stephanie Chapman spoke to Meyuhas, who gave an overall view of Israel's trade opportunities, while Noy concentrated on the Canadian prospects.

Giora Meyuhas



Benjamin Noy

CJN: Besides the obvious free trade agreement Israel has with the U.S., what are the differences in trade relations between Israel and Canada?

Meyuhas: It's a huge, huge difference. The trade between Israel and the United States totals almost $8 billion — in each direction. It's almost balanced.

Noy: With Canada, both ways, it is about $300 million (Canadian). Last year, it was more than $150 million on both sides.

Meyuhas: You can see this is exactly the influence of the free trade agreement. Canadian products cannot compete with American products because of the duties. Its as simple as that. And, now that you have NAFTA — the agreement between Mexico and the United States — it's just obvious that because of the very unique situation Israel has and because Israel will be the centre of the Middle East, it [an agreement between Canada and Israel] is quite essential.

CJN: What other advantages would there be for Canadian businesses other than their ability to compete on pricing?

Meyuhas: I would like business people to come to do business in and with Israel on one condition — pure business considerations. To make money. The advantages that Israel has for Canadians are hi-tech capabilities.

I would like to give you some figures about BIRD. The Bi-Lateral Research and Development (BIRD) foundation was formed between the United States and Israel. It is an endowment fund of $1.5 million which is still in the bank. It was established about 15 years ago.

Today, the income by taxation to both countries is about $130 million. Of the success stories of the BIRD foundation, 2,000 people are employed. It created jobs. It created businesses. It created income for the countries and the money is still in the bank.

Its a wonderful thing. It worked because of the hi-tech capabilities in Israel. I see no difference. It could be exactly the same in Canada . [See story on the new Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation on Page 1].

CJN: What are some of the key things that Canadian companies should be aware of when considering doing business with Israel? And what are some of the barriers?

Meyuhas: There are no barriers. There are cultural barriers in a way but these can be very easily overcome. We are a very western country but relatively different. When you come to Israel, you have to take that into consideration.

The distance and the time differences were mentioned but these can be advantages. I was speaking to someone in California. What happens is that Israel sends a fax at the end of their working day so it is here at the beginning of your working day. If you know how to work with this and take advantage, the process can be very efficient.

Noy: You can work around the clock.

Meyuhas: That's exactly what's happening. So in a way, California, which is nine hours' difference — here, it is only six hours difference — it's not really a barrier.

The barrier, of course, with Canada, as we mentioned, is the duty barrier that we still have. Hopefully we'll be able to work out an agreement.

Noy: What I would like to emphasize, is the advantage is not only to Israel. As a matter of fact, it's more to Canada's advantage because Israel's market is already open to most industrialized countries.

In terms of it being a threat to Canadian jobs, [as was one of the main points debated surrounding Canada's free trade agreement with the U.S. and NAFTA] if we view it objectively and look at it case by case, there is almost no threat — I'm not saying 100 per cent — to Canadian jobs.

Even if you look at the sensitive industries in Canada — auto, pulp and paper, agriculture — there is still no threat. Canada can only gain by selling to Israel and with Israeli imports.

CJN: In the past, Israel's bureaucracy has been noted as a problem and even as a deterrent for setting up business. Does this still hold true today?

Meyuhas: No. It was bad. There is no question about it. It has improved tremendously and I can say that it's not worse than the United States, Canadian or European bureaucracy. It's not that we don't have it — we still do — but everyone does.

Noy: I'll give you the example I tell business people and they don't believe it.

Israel has a law called the Law of Encouragement of Capital Investments under which, if approved, companies may receive an approved status which makes them eligible for up to a 30 per cent grant of their investment and in some areas a 10-year tax holiday. Its very substantial.

Now, when you submit an application, there is a regulation that the government has to respond to you within 14 days. The response does not necessarily have to be a positive one — it could be a negative one or that we need more information.

An answer must be given in 14 days. No one believes this is true — 14 days. It may be a project of $5 million, $10 million, $100 million, can you imagine?

Government officials know that if they don't respond, they may cause the government damages. There is no other country that has such a regulation.

CJN: What sectors of Israeli industries are likely to be looking for joint ventures?

Meyuhas: All sectors. The food industry, textiles, agrotech — Israel is very strong in irrigation — hi-tech, chemical, electronic, pharmaceutical, biotechnology, imaging and telecommunications. We are leaders in all these areas. I don't want to limit myself.

CJN: In connection with the peace accord, several groups have been formed. You mentioned Builders For Peace [a group consisting of Jewish and Arab American industrialists planning investments in the territories once self-rule begins]. Have you been approached or has there been any interest at all from their Canadian counterparts?

Noy: Yes, there has been. We've been contacted in both our offices in Toronto and Montreal by Canadian Arabs and by companies of Arab countries that are represented here in Canada. They want to make contacts with Israeli companies so they can be prepared for the opening of the borders. There is an interest.

CJN: What are some of the short- and long-term effects of the peace accord?

Meyuhas: No. 1, multinational companies and cultures will come to Israel. No. 2, trade between Israel and the Arab nations. No. 3, joint ventures which, in the long term, will utilize the hi-tech capabilities of Israel and for the short term, the cheap labor. I underline the short term here because I do hope to elevate the standard of living otherwise, it [the peace accord] will not fly. But, for the short term, let's take advantage of it.

Of course, once stability comes to the region, all the countries will spend much much less on defence. Israel, for example, if we only save 50 per cent of what we are spending today, we can save up to $4 billion per annum.

CJN: Regarding the signing of the peace accord, personally, did you ever think you would see this day come?

Meyuhas: No. But I was always hoping because I have always been involved — personally and politically. It was a surprise to all of us.

CJN: Do you think it will last?

Meyuhas: It will last because it's essential for both parties. It's in our mutual interest. But, it will last mainly because of the economic development of Israel.

CJN: Are you getting inquiries from Canadian firms? And, how do they vary in size and product?

Noy: Again, the answer would be similar to what Meyuhas said — all kinds. We have a lot of inquiries about food, clothing and jewelry. All kinds of inquiries regarding industrial products, medical products, machines — you name it — everything.

CJN: What is the most unusual inquiry you've ever received?

Noy: We had an inquiry from a farmer from Alberta who wanted to purchase ostrich eggs from Israel. Believe it or not, Israel is one of two countries that raise ostrichs so he certainly came to the right source.

CJN: Marketing was a topic brought forth several times as an industry that has fallen behind. Why is it not done effectively in Israel?

Meyuhas: If Israel is exporting today 43 per cent off all goods manufactured, of which 51 per cent are hi-tech products, how can anyone say we don't have marketing capabilities?

We have to look at our weaker points — and we do have weaker points — but what is needed to enhance the economy [and] establish ourselves to a million export-oriented companies is No. 1, the product, No. 2, is marketing.

There is no problem of money. There are so many capital funds in Israel that need projects and marketing tours. This is the reason we're looking towards joint ventures and doing business with other companies around the world who can utilize the workforce in Israel, develop the project and the product and manufacture in Israel and utilize their capabilities of marketing abroad.

CPI Rises 1 Per Cent

JERUSALEM — The Consumer Price Index (CPI) shot up one per cent in March, as rising housing prices continued to fan inflation.

Central Bureau of Statistics economists now estimate inflation for 1994 will be 10 per cent. The government has set its goal for inflation this year at 8 per cent.

Treasury economists were caught by surprise, expecting a price rise of about half a per cent for last month. But Jonathan Katz, head of Economic Modeling and Forecasting, expected the higher index based on the increase of housing prices at the end of last year.

Katz said that in the coming months he expects to see the moderating impact of the stock market's sharp downturn earlier this year on housing prices.

Housing prices jumped 2.7 per cent last month, as apartment prices shot up 3.3 per cent, while rents fell 0.7 per cent, due to a drop in the dollar.

Group Warns of Economic Instability

JERUSALEM — Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce economists recently reported that while there are as yet no significant signs of a slowdown in economic activity, the present political and security situation is threatening the economy with instability.

According to the economists, most indicators until the end of last month were positive. Tax revenues were up, industrial production rose, imports of production inputs and of machinery and equipment increased, retail trade expanded and the number of jobseekers fell.

The only negative indicators were the drop in industrial exports and in job offers. The recent closure will have a harsh impact on agriculture and on building. The economists estimate the harm suffered by the housing industry will have wider repercussions on the economy, affecting growth and pushing up interest rates.

Fewer Job Seekers

JERUSALEM — The number of jobless who register with the Employment Service last month dropped 5.3 per cent, following the trend of the 7.6 per cent drop in February.

But Minister of Labor and Social Affairs Ora Namir presented the positive statistics along with some worrying trends — more jobless going longer without work, resistance to positive change in the Negev and other depressed areas, jobless who are not ready to take the work available and a grim picture of job offers.

Jobless registering with the Employment Service dropped to 107,600 in March, compared with 111,600 in February and 118,800 in January.

If seasonal factors are taken into account, however, the decline is less dramatic. Corrected figures for last month show that the decline should be seen as a drop to 101,900 jobless from 107,600, or a 5.3 per cent drop.

There was also a 5.1 per cent rise last month in the number of new immigrants who are jobless, after a steady decline in their numbers over the last two years. Some 10,300 new immigrants registered with the service last month, compared to to 9,800 in February.

Tourism Rises Despite Unrest

JERUSALEM — March tourism figures jump 37 per cent: The Hebron massacre apparently did not deter many tourists, as some 177,100 of them visited here, reports the Central Bureau of Statistics.

The figures represent a 37 per cent jump in visitors compared to the previous month. During the first quarter of the year, 415,800 tourists visited, an 18 per cent increase compared to the previous quarter.

Fibronics, Wang sign cooperation agreement: Fibronics International has signed a cooperation agreement to incorporate its products in computer company Wang's projects in England. Fibronics' shares are traded in New York.

Israel's $1.37 Billion Deficit

JERUSALEM — The country's current account balance registered a deficit of $1.37 billion last year following a $218 million surplus in 1992, as the trade deficit widened and receipts of unilateral transfers fell, reports the Central Bureau of Statistics.

The current account includes the balance of trade and of financial transfers.

The trade deficit jumped 21.8 per cent to $8.12 billion, as imports expanded $2.9 billion, only to be partially offset by a $1.5 billion rise in exports.

Net unilateral transfers — including foreign aid, reparation payments from Germany and donations — fell a slight 2 billion to $6.747 billion as foreign aid decreased after rising in the Gulf War's aftermath.

Unilateral transfers only covered 83 per cent of the trade deficit, unlike in 1992 when such receipts were 4 per cent higher than the trade gap.

TORONTO — What's the most important aspect to consider when looking at real estate? Location, location, location!

Nobody knows that better than David Stein. He trademarked his real estate company's name Locations, Inc., Realtor in 1987.

A property's location is the defining feature that can make or break a sale in real estate, but professionalism in any business transaction is crucial. It is especially so when dealing with such a large investment.

Stein's team of agents are professional and competent. "The company is basically as strong as the people that work with it," Stein says.

He believes real estate agents are professionals who are due the same respect as lawyers and accountants.

"People come to an agent or broker to spend the most money they've ever spent in their life." The agent is "providing a service that takes a certain education and certain knowledge."

Stein says people's opinions of real estate agents are often inflated.

There is a misconception that agents make a lot of money with little work. But "to gain knowledge and experience takes time. Looking out for vendors' and purchasers' interests, understanding the marketplace and understanding the art of negotiation," these skills are developed over a long period of time.

Stein himself has been working in the field almost 20 years. He, together with his office, wants to change that misconception, but only by earning the respect realtors rightly deserve.

Locations Inc. provides a complete range of services including in-house financing, appraisals and custom home building. His agents have shown strong results in a tough market.

"We've had a few instances where we've had multiple offers on different houses, but basically the market is active, but not booming. First-time buyers are doing one of two things, they're either stepping up and buying now or they're being put out of the market."

When asked if he thinks there might be a more dramatic turn for the better in the future, Stein responds, "My crystal ball is cloudy today. I always tell people 'Don't look at your home to buy and sell quickly.' "

He believes we're in a new reality, and that there's not going to be a lot of profit-taking in residential real estate.

The days of the speculator are over and the focus today is on the family. Your home is just that — a place to "lay down your roots, not a short-term investment."

But future months should be fairly busy at Locations Inc., Stein adds. "We've had an active spring market and we're looking forward to much the same for the summer."

SAUDI CABLE COMPANY

BREAKING DOWN BARRIERS

An exclusive first. Yitahak Kaul, director-general of Israel's main telephone and telecommunications company Bezek (right) with Moshe Habba, Bezek chairman (left), meet with a representative of the Saudi Arabian telecommunication company, the Saudi Cable Company. It was the first time that officials from Israeli and Saudi telecommunication firms have ever met. The meeting took place at an international telecommunciations fair held in Cairo and inaugurated by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Mideast peace analyzed

RAMAT GAN — Israel-Arab peace accords will not lead quickly to a rise in the regional standard of living, substantial cuts in military expenditures, an influx of foreign investment, or to large-scale regional trade and tourism, says one Mideast anyalyst.

Prof. Eliyahu Kanovsky of the Besa Centre for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University was writing in the just-released report, Assessing the Mideast Peace Economic Dividend .

The Besa Centre is an independent institute devoted to the study of Middle East strategic, diplomatic and economic issues.

"Senior Israeli officials involved in the current Arab-Israeli peace talks have painted a grand, sweeping vision of Middle East economic prosperity, and Palestinian expectations of economic transformation are already inflated," Kanovsky writes.

"Failure to meet these unsubstantiated forecasts can only disappoint and disgruntle, threatening to sour Palestinian Arabs, Israelis and others on the peace process, even on the concept of peace itself."

Considered by many to be the dean of Middle East economists (he correctly predicted the fall of oil prices and decline of the Mideast economies early in 1981), Kanovsky debunks six popular assumptions about the economic dividends of Mideast peace in the new study.

"In propagating the illusion that a new era of financial fortune and economic stability is dawning . . . government officials are creating false expectations and doing a disservice."

Copies of Assessing the Mideast Peace Economic Dividend can be obtained by calling Jonathan Schneiderman, Canadian director of Besa Centre, at (514) 731-7893.

Tips From Pros

TORONTO — In spite of the fact that most business comes from referrals, many professionals and entrepreneurs find it hard to ask for referrals from clients and others. So why are we all so shy?

Asking for Referrals

1. We fear rejection. We're just plain afraid the person we ask will say no. This is not unlike the fear many of us had as teenagers when it came to asking for a date.

2. We don't want to appear to be in need of business. We think if we're any good our practice would be jam packed. We feel if we let prospects think we have room to grow we'll appear incompetent.

3. We don't want to damage our existing relationship, in the event we do a bad job for the person referred to us. This, of course, happens so rarely that the worry is often just a cover-up for the fear of rejection.

4. We don't want to appear pushy. Most people want to avoid looking like a salesperson.

5. We don't want to learn by experience. Some people just don't like to do something, like requesting referrals, unless they can do it well.

Here's my five-step way to get into the habit of asking for referrals.

Make a list of the benefits you'll get by asking for referrals

For example:

- You'll feel like you're doing more to market your practice.
- You'll have more big clients and more income.
- You'll be able to turn away clients you don't want to work with.
- You'll be able to buy a new Corvette.

Make a Plan to Make the Job Easy

Chunk down your plan into all its components. Each step should be relatively easy to do.

- Have small goals, i.e., ask only one person a day for the first week.
- Choose a specific time to start. The day, the hour and the minute.
- Decide who you will ask first.

Flood your mind with positive images

- Plan where you will pop the question.
- Decide your words in advance. (for example: "Sarah, can you suggest anyone who might be a good client for me?")
- Choose words you are comfortable with.
- Practice what you will say.

Do a potential problem analysis

Think about what can go wrong and how you will react in any given situation.

- Think about answers to questions you may be asked. ("What kind of clients? What kind of industries? Do you mean corporate or personal clients?)
- Think about different ways to bring up the subject in different situations; at lunch, after a meeting, on the phone.

Increase your confidence

Flood your mind with positive images. Make a "victory list" of your five best successes. Consider clients you have helped and how grateful they were. Look at it from time to time.

Visualize success. Learn to feel and act like you just made a big deal. It need not have happened. You simply have to learn to feel like it did and then "act" that feeling. You'll soon learn to conjure up this feeling of confidence and use it to your advantage.

Reward yourself

After you have made that first request for a referral, give yourself a reward so that you can associate a second good feeling with your accomplishment. Do this each time you ask for a referral.

A word about motivation. Many people put off asking for referrals until they feel motivated to do so. Since there are so many reasons why people don't ask, chances are motivation is a long way off. My advice is don't wait to be motivated. It will never come. Simply decide that asking for referrals is something you have to do and get on with using the five-step process above.

Once you get rolling, you'll find it easy to keep going. Your motivation and momentum will build.

Firm offers couples wedding insurance

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The wedding should have been a happy affair. But the groom was crying during his speech.

His father had collapsed and was hospitalized the day before the wedding. The family could not afford to postpone it, because they would have lost thousands of dollars.

The wedding went on as scheduled, but no one felt like celebrating, says Diana Fabiano, a cousin of the groom. "It was the saddest wedding I've ever been to."

Had the family taken out wedding insurance, the affair could have been cancelled and rescheduled for a more opportune time. The insurance company would have picked up the tab for the deposits.

But few people have heard about wedding insurance. The policy is called Weddinguard and while it's been available in Canada for three years, it's only been promoted since January.

Weddinguard was developed for Canadians by Bob Morrison of Party Alcohol Liability (PAL) Insurance Brokers in Calgary (1-800-661-1608). The insurance, available through any insurance broker, is underwritten by Pafco Insurance, (231-6983) a Toronto-based insurance company.

Wedding insurance is quite popular in Britain and Europe. With the average North American wedding costing $16,000, Morrison says it makes sense to insure the day against a sudden catastrophe like sickness or death.

Weddinguard's standard policy starts at $150. In the event of a cancellation it covers up to $4,000 for non-refundable charges such as deposits on food and flowers, and $2,000 for the honeymoon.

The company recognizes a wide range of unforseen circumstances that could cause a cancellation: illness or death of any relative, transportation problems for important guests, sudden unemployment of the person paying for the wedding and damage to or bankruptcy of the wedding hall.

The basic package will also cover up to $2,500 for loss or damage to bridal attire, $2,500 for the photographs if the negatives are damaged or the photographer doesn't show up, and $5,000 for damage to wedding presents in the bride or groom's possession 72 hours before the wedding.

In addition there is $1,000,000 public liability to pay for accidental injury to anyone attending the party or for damage to the property. (Weddinguard does not cover accidental injury caused by alcohol but there is separate insurance for party alcohol liability.)

Weddinguard can be adapted for bar mitzvahs, says Morrison. And the cost of the basic package can be increased to extend the amount of coverage.

As long as there are no known circumstances likely to cause a cancellation Weddinguard can be bought anytime before the wedding. And while the policy insures a broad range of unforseen problems, it does not cover the break up of a couple.

If they cancel because they're out of love they'll be out of pocket for any money they've spent.

Phyllis Billie is getting married next year. She hasn't set a date or made plans, but she will definitely consider wedding insurance. "I've had too many friends who have lost their deposits on halls that have gone bankrupt.

"They're there one day and then they're gone and so is the money," she says. "With the amount of money you spend on a wedding, taking out wedding insurance is worth it."

BLACKOUT...

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

Wendy Phillips' dream wedding turned into a nightmare at 4 p.m. on an icy Sunday this January.

That was when Phillips, already dressed in her wedding finery and surrounded by her six bridesmaids, found out the power was out at the Adath Israel, the Toronto synagogue where she was to marry Michael Papernick at 5:30 p.m. Almost 200 guests were on their way.

Local Hydro officials couldn't say when the synagogue's lights, heating and phone lines would be up and running. There was a chance the wedding, carefully planned for six months, would have to be cancelled.

"I was devastated when they told me," Wendy Papernick said. The groom, 28, tried to comfort his bride, 27, but all the same "you could hear me crying down the block."

What the wedding party didn't realize was that while they were taking pictures at the bride's home, Adath Israel caterer Linda Sugar was phoning around trying to find an available hall with a kosher kitchen. She eventually found one at Beth Sholom Synagogue, about a 10-minute drive from Adath Israel.

Sugar learned of the power failure at 1 p.m. She didn't want to panic the families, and instead used the catering office's fax line to place outward calls to find out what was available. Only at 4 p.m., when nothing had turned up, did Sugar call bridal consultant Karen Garscadden at the bride's family home.

Luxurious Wheels

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The owner of a dazzling fleet of classic Rolls-Royce limousines, available for party and wedding rental, said he almost stops traffic when he is out in one of his beautifully restored vehicles.

Whether he is on the road in a 1950s Silver Wraith, a 1967 Phantom V or a 1978 Silver Shadow, pedestrians pause to admire the passing Rolls-Royce and drivers honk their horns and chat with Stanley Gill of Gillmore Classics (416-733-9216) at traffic lights.

Gill, known as Major Stanley Gill — he spent 40 years in the Canadian military, including time in the reserve — says his customers are thrilled when they find one of his limos, "a beautiful piece of automotive architecture," and a chauffeur waiting in front of their homes to take them to their destination.

When his custom-built Rolls-Royces are not on wedding or party duty in Metropolitan Toronto, they can be seen in movies and on television, including CTVs cancelled ENG series.

A former Rolls-Royce mechanic from Manchester, England, Gill founded his North York business in 1989. While the majority of his clients prefer to hire his limousines for weddings, his service is available for parties, including proms, birthday parties, bar and bat mitzvahs, and anniversary celebrations. For their anniversaries couples have been chauffeured to the theatre in Gill's limousines, and once a newborn baby rode home from the hospital in one of his classic cars.

Elegant

"People have been getting bored with regular limousines, and they are looking for something different. We have come up with the most unique collection of classic limousines in the city," Gill said.

His fleet of hand-built Rolls-Royces, all luxuriously appointed and in pristine condition, include two five-seater Silver Wraiths in stunning navy and silver. The third Silver Wraith, in white, seats eight. Gill's white Phantom V, a seven-seater, is the largest and heaviest car built post-war. The model is popular with the queen, Gill noted, who owns five of them. An elegant four-seater sedan, the white Silver Shadow, rounds off Gill's collection.

A member of the Canadian, American and British Rolls-Royce Clubs, Gill said he sometimes contacts local members of the club to ask them to lend him their cars when he has more business than he can handle or when clients request a black Rolls. Currently he has several weddings booked with Rolls-Royce Club members.

Gill's loyal staff of chauffeurs, including two ex-sergeant majors and family members, are always punctual, impeccably attired, and understand the social decorum of driving a valuable car.

Speeding is definitely out. Not only would it be somewhat undignified for a Rolls to tear up the road but rough usage, which includes speeding, would incur sky-high maintenance costs, according to Gill.

The Silver Wraiths are more difficult to drive than contemporary cars since they lack the car technology of the past forty years, so Gill's chauffeurs use special care. "We never abuse a car with high mileage," he said.

Gill keeps mileage low by restricting distance — his limousine service operates in the greater Metropolitan Toronto area only — and by avoiding everyday on-call driving.

To get the Rolls-Royce of their choice, he suggests clients book a minimum of six months before the date of their event. On Sundays rates are reduced by 20 per cent.

The bride and groom weren't prepared to cancel the wedding outright; they had their honeymoon cruise booked for early the next morning. The only alternative was to get married by a judge friend in the Phillips home . . . with a very abbreviated guest list.

Those same guests were starting to pull up to the Adath Israel as the move to the Beth Sholom was confirmed at 4:30 p.m. Rabbi Emeritus Erwin Schild, who was to perform the ceremony with Rabbi Steven Saltzman, stood in the synagogue parking lot letting people know about the change in venue.

Meanwhile, Sugar was standing inside in the darkness, overseeing the synagogue's waiting and maintenance staff as they packed the food for 190 meals, cooking utensils and the contents of the bar by candlelight.

The food — crepes, salad, fish, chicken, stir fried vegetables, dessert and the sweet table — was loaded into cars and driven to the Beth Sholom. The rabbis and Cantor Eli Kirshblum pitched right in, with Rabbi Schild having the honor of transporting the main course.

"The only thing we forgot was the Worcester sauce," Sugar said, "and they had that at the Beth Sholom."

Once at the new synagogue, it was a scramble to set up the tables, the flowers, the band and the chupah. Sugar says while 60- and 70-year-old waitresses were lugging tables into place, she was finishing off last-minute preparation of the salmon and the salads. The chupah began at 6:30 p.m., only one hour late.

It was smooth sailing from there. Both the Papernicks and Sugar said guests told them they would never have known the wedding wasn't planned for the Beth Sholom. The wedding party mined the potential disaster for comic effect in every speech.

The power came back on at the Adath Israel at midnight, the same time the Papernick wedding was winding down. The happy newlyweds caught their flight to Florida at 7:30 a.m. as scheduled, while the organizers were inundated by a flood of well-deserved congratulations.

As for Sugar, the wedding she catered the following week was anticlimactic. The lights were on.

The PERFECT HONEYMOON

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Getting married is so hectic most couples can't wait for their honeymoon. They need to recuperate from the wedding.

"Between the caterer and the family and the planning all they have to look forward to is the honeymoon," says Tena Falco, (905-764-0060) branch manager of Marlin Travel in the Promenade. "They want to get on with the honeymoon and be on some beach somewhere."

Places with tropical weather, sandy beaches, and beautiful sunsets have the most appeal for the majority of newlyweds.

Sharon Benjamin who's getting married next February is planning a honeymoon in the tropics. "I definitely want somewhere warm," she says. "That's a requirement."

Hawaii is the most popular destination for honeymoons, with the Caribbean a close second, says Betty Shukster of Travel 24 (222-2440) at 1575 Steeles Ave. East. And it is also common for people to choose all-inclusive resorts like Sandals and Club Med or even cruises, she says.

"I would personally like an all-inclusive honeymoon," Benjamin says. "You don't have to worry about money. You can just enjoy yourself."

The price of these trips varies considerably, depending on the accommodations, Shukster says. Trips to Hawaii — usually 10 to 14 days because of the 10-hour flight — start at $4,000 per couple for hotel and airfare. A week in the Caribbean costs $1,600 and up for two.

Shukster cautions people against choosing the least expensive travel packages. "The lowest price is not necessarily good value." She says people choose cheap packages with dreadful accommodations thinking they won't spend any time in their hotel.

But they end up having a terrible time, she says. "They're looking for a cadillac and they get a volkswagen. But they really want a cadillac."

Travel 24 offers a registry for honeymoons — people can contribute money towards the cost of a honeymoon as a gift. Couples living together before they get married tend to have a lot of household items and they don't need traditional shower gifts, Shukster says.

A honeymoon registry is an alternative. Donors get receipts and the couple get a list of their names. Shukster says people like the idea, but it's not that popular.

Benjamin thought she might consider it. "If that was the case, we could go for something more upscale. That would be neat. Maybe we could do something like a Sandals Resort."

Sandals Resorts are a luxury chain in the Caribbean designed exclusively for couples. They cost between $3,000 and $5,000 a week per couple, depending on which resort they choose. The price includes the cost of meals, activities, and even drinks.

"Sandals are ultra all-inclusive resorts," says Sharon Gordon of Village Gate Travel (905-764-8858) at 7787 Yonge St. "The accommodations are very luxurious. You can get a room overlooking a cliff or with a private plunge pool."

The Village Gate is offering a special honeymoon promotion in conjunction with Sandals Resorts and four bridal shops: Adele Wechsler, Avenue Road; Lina's Bridal Boutique, Weston Road; Moda Sposa Bridal Boutique, Thornhill; and Carmani Couture, on St. Clair Ave. West.

Anyone buying her wedding gown at one of the above shops and booking a honeymoon at Sandals Resorts through the Village Gate travel agency will have a chance to win the cost of her wedding gown — up to the value of $3,000.

Falco (Marlin Travel) highly recommends the Sandals Resorts because they are geared to newlyweds. "I was at Sandals Resort in St. Lucia and I was shocked by how many guests were honeymooners and people getting married. On average there were two weddings a day," she says.

Many resorts and hotels offer wedding packages costing in the $500 range. For example, Sandals Resorts will provide clergy or a Justice of the Peace, witnesses, flowers, cake, video of the ceremony, champagne, and a sunset cruise.

Falco says Sandals Resorts are offering a special travel package for the Sandal Inn in Jamaica. They will reduce the weekly price to $1,300 a person for couples booking before Dec. 13.

It's a good deal, she says, because couples can use all the facilities at any of six other Sandals Resorts in Jamaica, but pay a lower price. Transportation is provided.

Falco likes all-inclusive packages, like resorts and cruises, because food costs in the Caribbean can be high. St. Martin's and Aruba with their duty free shops and gambling are very popular places for newlyweds, but they're expensive, she says.

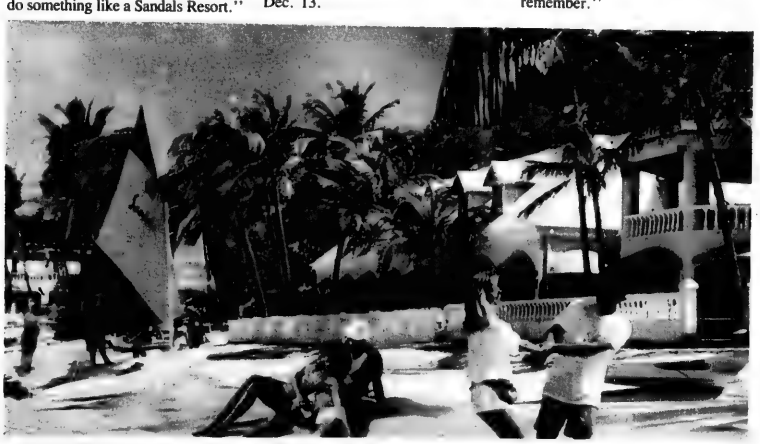
Honeymooners who book air-travel packages with the above travel agencies get freebies: limousine service to the aiport or a free night at an airport hotel from Marlin Travel and Travel 24, and free limousine service to the airport from Village Gate Travel.

But not all newlyweds have the time and money to travel very far from home. "Niagara Falls is still the romantic honeymoon capital and it's an inexpensive way to travel for a budget-conscious couple," Falco says.

The Howard Johnson Hotel on the Canadian side has honeymoon suites with balconies overlooking the falls, round beds, heart-shaped Jacuzzis, and mirrored ceilings, she says. "It's very romantic. I recommend it all the time and no one's been disappointed."

Couples also take more unusual honeymoons. Falco just made arrangements for a four-day rock-climbing trip for a pair of outdoor enthusiasts. Gordon (Village Gate Travel) said an African Safari was the most exotic honeymoon she's ever booked and Shukster (Travel 24) is sending one couple on a bicycle tour in France.

All these agents advise couples to plan carefully because honeymoons are special trips. "You'll never have that special time again," Shukster says. "Have something nice to remember."



Both these photos were taken at one of the luxurious Sandal resorts. Sharon Gordon of Village Gate Travel is offering a special honeymoon promotion in conjunction with four Toronto bridal shops — Adele Wechsler, Lina's Bridal Boutique, Moda Sposa Bridal Boutique and Carmani Couture. You could win the cost of your wedding gown - up to the value of $3,000!

PARTY'S HERE !

Look your best on that special day

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

As your special day approaches, you are busy setting the stage for a perfect and memorable occasion.

There is no doubt, that you have taken extreme care in selecting the gown of your dreams, sensational flowers and your favorite photographer. You have arranged everything to make your day ideal; however, your mood might still be totally distressed.

Perhaps your hair is too curly — or maybe too short; you are five pounds overweight or 10 pounds underweight; your skin is too blotchy; or you have dark circles under your eyes.

The good news is that you are not alone; women everywhere share these horrific thoughts. The devastating feeling that you will not look your absolute best can be overwhelming. Well I hope that you can at least put some of these fears aside, as you sit back, read on and relax. With the help of these beauty tips, there is no doubt that you will radiate on your special day.

Skin care is your first step to looking your best. Few artists can paint a masterpiece on a spotty canvas. You must become aware of the type of skin you have before you can choose the right skin care regime for you. It is probably a good idea to get a professional opinion and begin your procedure at least six months prior to your wedding date.

Your diet is extremely important. Beauty certainly does begin from within. Avoid all caffeine products and yes that does include chocolate. Alcoholic beverages should be kept to a minimum, especially one week prior to the wedding date. You should eat an abundance of fruit and vegetables; this will keep your skin looking fresh and healthy. Drink at least eight glasses of water daily to avoid dehydration. Dehydration means a lack of moisture in your skin which can cause unnecessary fine lines.

Exercise should be part of your life. If a vigorous aerobic workout is not for you, do 20 minutes of stretching or walking daily. This will help relieve your stress and keep you calm through this hectic time of decision-making and planning. Exercise will also help to stimulate your blood circulation and definitely improve your skin tone.

Proper makeup application need not be complicated or agonizing. Makeup should enhance your good features and camouflage your less attractive ones. You do not want to paint a mask. The golden rule is always "Less is more." Applying your blush-on can be a real task. Use a large soft brush and dust the color on your cheekbones. Then blend in circular motion with a soft velcro sponge.

A lightly-textured liquid foundation should be applied over your entire face. This will make your skin appear smooth and silky. Choose a color that matches your natural skin tone and be sure to blend well along your jaw line.

Eye pencil — apply close to your eyelashes, a little thicker on your top lid and blend well. Effective colors are gray, black or brown.

Eye shadow — do remember to leave the frosting for the cake. Use neutral shades, such as, mocha, sand or chocolate. Blend your eye shadow well to give you that sultry look.

Mascara — the only colors to use are black or brown. Remember to keep it natural, be careful not to clump your lashes together.

Fun-filled party packages

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

If you go to Face Back or Loots before your next party, you'll be sure to leave your guests with a gift they'll keep for a long time.

Whether you're on a budget or going all out to have that one-of-a-kind party, Face Back, (416) 861-0055, offers fun-filled party packages that will suit everyone. Co-owner Scot Parker says that he and his partners have a background in specialty programming in the broadcast video/computer graphics industry, and they developed Face Back to maximize fun at parties of all types.

He says that what they do is offer customers a choice of over 150 images covering sports or movie stars, cartoon characters or such action figures as Rambo or Indiana Jones. They then video each person at the party for an average of three to five minutes and after a selection is made, super-impose the person on the image, using specialized video and computer equipment. The fun begins when this process is watched by others on video monitors.

Parker, who says they will come out to all types of affairs from small house parties to receptions or conventions, says that the picture can be output onto a T-shirt or mug for the guest to take home. "It's really a great fantasy for the person in the picture and it's also a lot of fun for the guests to watch."

Loots, (416) 787-5668, a creative party store, specializes in, age-appropriate theme loot bags, each costing $4.99. Among the 80 loot bags they carry is a flower pot decorating kit that includes a bag of soil, seeds, paints, glitter, glue and a paintbrush; or they may choose an outdoor kit with frisbee and skipping ropes. An arts and crafts bag could include a fridge magnet, light plate, puppets, crowns or picture frames. Younger children enjoy policemen kits complete with handcuffs and a whistle or an accessory kit for girls, with stick-on earrings, shoe laces and a feather hair band.

Owner David Leese says it is the perfect place for busy parents. "When they come into the store, samples of every type of loot bag with the suggested age range are mounted on one wall. All they have to do is choose, and we put it in a bag tied with a pipe cleaner. Guests come away from the party thrilled with their gift."

He adds that with an inventory that also includes invitations, tablecloths, napkins and candy, it really is a one-stop party shop. "If they wish, customers can buy the kits in bulk to use as party activities and we even arrange for custom-made cakes with themes ranging from Power Rangers to Sesame Street."

Leese says that the concept of having everything under one roof "is a brand new, innovative retail concept. We offer everything including personal service with an accent on customer's needs. We'll even go to a party and outfit the room."

The latest in photography

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

High quality video cameras, CD-ROMs, virtual reality; how's a photographer to compete?

Despite the invasion of high technology into the visual arts landscape, traditional photographers are holding their own by offering something they've always specialized in — high quality and a classic look.

While CD-ROMs may one day change the face of photography, that day is not today. Prohibitive costs limit the use of the high technology technique, which uses CDs and computers to manipulate images, superimpose fantasy backgrounds and add elements to the picture that were not really there. The technique is used primarily in advertising photography.

Those planning weddings, bar or bat mitzvahs and other joyful occasions must make do with more traditional technology, but that traditional art still provides a technically accomplished visual record of a simchah. In fact, in a day and age when even newspapers are switching over to color for their artwork, some photography clients are turning back the clock and asking for the classic look of black and white images.

Traditional techniques such as color tinting and sepia (brown) toning of photographs are also coming back in vogue, say three photographers active in the commercial portrait market.

"People still love the traditional look and flair," said Sam Sciarrino, proprietor of Horvath Studios (487-3443).

"Some people look for things that are different, innovative and new," said Joe Lavee of Lavee Studios (733-2457). "However, the classic and the traditional still prevail. The stuff that always comes back and that the majority can relate to is the classic style."

Care for detail and making a session fun for the clients are important elements for any photographer, he said.

Sciarrino said "going with the personalities of the people and getting their expressions" on film are the most important elements for any photographer. "You don't want them doing something that's just not them."

Still, within that framework, there's plenty of room to maneuver. Working under Tibor Horvath, the former owner of the studio, Sciarrino learned "about lighting and composition. I developed my own style that is contemporary with traditional elements to it."

Sciarrino said some couples prefer a contemporary look that incorporates architectural settings and closeups. "There are more lines, architectural forms in the background and the use of wide and angle and fisheye lenses," he said.

Scheffer, who was also trained as a graphic artist, said "I take advantage of my creativity with very stylized compositions. I like to think I design images, not take photographs. I don't do assembly line photography."

Scheffer said he tries to make couples comfortable and accommodate their requests. Some prefer black and white images and the "modern look of a fashion pose, something with some mood. . . It's a stylized pose, even to the point of an awkward pose when they're off-balance."

He said he can enhance the black and white image later with hand coloring. When shooting color film, he can get a fashion look by creative use of backlighting, perhaps employing a rose hue.

For Lavee, sitting down with the clients and getting a read on their personalities is a key element before planning a photo session.

"It's like a painter, but you paint with light. Any work uses shadows and highlights. I can elongate or shorten a face. Using different lights, you create something that you see. It's your interpretation."

Black and white film provides a more dramatic effect, he said, while color remains the standard for portraits. Lavee said that in recent years, clients have requested unusual locations for photo shoots, especially country backdrops or looks that are semi-industrial. "Others want abstract or architectural backdrops."

Perhaps one day computers working with CDs will manipulate the image to give the desired effect. But until cameras are consigned to museums, relying on expert photographers will remain the standard in the industry.

These photographs demonstrate some of the techniques used in the industry today. The top photo was supplied by Barry Scheffer Photography. The photo on the right was supplied by Lavee Studio.

Makeup for the Blushing Bride

A before and after photo from Featuring...You.

As a bride-to-be, you have so many things to organize. The gown, the invitations, the venue, the flowers, the music, the meal, the seating plan — and the list goes on.

Hopefully, you've found professionals you can work with to assist you with some of the tasks. Most importantly, for the evening to be a great success, you've tried to find a professional who can help you look your radiant best.

A blushing bride is an effect not easily achieved without an expert touch. One expert makeup artist, Shelley Levine (905-886-2663), believes that the natural look most brides want to achieve can only be done properly with the right blending of blush and contour, the right tools (brushes) and an artistic hand.

Shelley Levine

"It takes a great deal more time and expertise to have a natural look than a made-up face," she explains.

"Pinks, earth tones and natural shades are what's hot this spring for brides and their attendants. It's makeup that doesn't look like makeup. Colors today are entirely natural and neutral, not theatrical looking at all. Whereas the most popular color used to be apple red, people are learning how to be more natural while still wearing makeup to define and enhance their own features." says Levine who has been running her business Makeup By Shelley for 10 years.

Marla Freedman (416)-633-6336, who has also run her own professional makeup artist business for 10 years, agrees with the trend toward the neutrals, which includes soft pinks, tawny and peach shades as well.

Marla Freedman

"What I do is try to match the makeup to the bride's personality, color preferences and features. Every bride wants to be magnificent. And it's my job to help her achieve that," says Freedman.

She strongly recommends that her clients set up a consultation prior to the wedding to test out that special "wedding day look." While Freedman will charge $50 for the consultation, the bride's face will be done for free on that day. And at the client's request, Freedman will remain on the scene throughout picture taking and up until the ceremony for touch-ups.

Another aspect of Freedman's business is makeup lessons for which she charges $60 for a full ½ hour hands-on demonstration. "Around the High Holy Days and at the beginning of each season, I begin to get requests from clients who want to change their look to work with their new wardrobe or to just have a lift. As part of this service, I always make up one-half of the face and then let them do the other half so they can apply what I am teaching them when the lesson is over," she explains.

Finally, for the bride who wants to go all out and really pamper herself prior to her special day, there is Featuring . . . You (783-7793) — a full service spa located on Eglinton between Bathurst and the Allen Expressway.

"We concentrate on everything and anything — from the top of the head to the tip of the toes," says partner and makeup artist Mary Orlando. From hair and makeup to manicures, pedicures, waxing, massage, lash tint and eyebrow shaping, Featuring . . . You offers these services and more either a la carte or in pre-bridal packages for approximately $125.00.

"Our philosophy is to encourage brides to start looking their best months before the wedding day. They need to strengthen their nails and hair and make sure that their skin is healthy in order to achieve their best look," she explains.

Since 1984, Orlando and hairstylist partner Franco Quintieri, whose work has been seen on Breakfast TV, Eye on Toronto, The New You, and in Chatelaine, The Toronto Star and other major publications, have helped hundreds of brides bring out their best features and walk down the aisle with confidence and style.

Other companies that supply esthetic services are:
•Cristine Dymond 636-5640
•Face Up To It 416-660-7695
•John DiBratto Hair Design 222-4247

"The natural look"

Also new for the spring, she says, is a focus on eyes and lips — all in brown tones. While it may sound somewhat wintry, with the right shades and blending, it creates a beautiful look.

It's more than a game

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

There is a new business simulation game on the market to help employees learn about co-workers who are minorities, persons with disabilities, accountants or women, and to teach staff to recognize how diversity impacts organizational performance.

Every Kind of Person, ideally played by multiple teams of four, simulates the operation of a fictitious company that develops and manages fantasy educational theme parks around the world. With a $1.5 million budget, each team is responsible for a three-year venture, the reconstruction of an ancient city, completed in three rounds of play.

Developed by People Tech Consulting Inc. along with about hundred employees of Co-operators Financial Services, Consumers Gas, Miles Pharmaceutical, the Etobicoke Board of Education and Zurich insurance, the game costs $1,500. Since the game was launched in February, two dozen have been sold in Canada and the U.S., reported People Tech vice-president Lorne Hartman. Net proceeds go to the United Way.

Every Kind of Person uses "the power of simulation to develop learning experiences in interpersonal perception, diversity awareness, group decision making and organizational change," says the game owners' manual. The manual was co-authored by Hartman and People Tech vice-president Rick Lash, two leaders in the game's research and development.

Selecting employees from fictitious cultural groups to head up various projects is one of the major tasks assigned to players. Among the candidates shown on the game video is Eduardo, an "Emerald from Pimini," who has a computer background. Players learn that Emeralds are hard-working and tend to be good with numbers. Another candidate for the job is Safron, a "Sapphire from Ekop," who has a commerce degree and works in accounting. Sapphires, players find out, are creative and emotional and Sapphire culture emphasizes music, art and theatre.

In the first of the debriefing sessions that follows each round of the game, participants explore how characteristics can be generalized to an individual because of their membership in a group regardless of the actual variation among members of that group, said Hartman and Lash.

"Prejudice is a negative or hostile attitude toward a distinguished group based on generalizations and stereotypes that are derived from faulty or incomplete information," they continue. "More than anything else, prejudice comes from conformity. Bigoted attitudes can be fostered unintentionally by real or imagined pressure from others."

Players learn how to make fair and objective decisions about hiring by defining job and work style requirements, then assessing each individual against the requirements and selecting the person who is the best match.

Hartman stressed that a facilitator should be present, acting as a game instructor and encouraging players to communicate their concerns if they become emotional, as they often do when they talk about bias and prejudice. When players do not get the chance to speak about what is bothering them during the game, Hartman and Lash warned, emotions can go underground, later emerging outside the classroom in the form of accusations, withdrawal or inappropriate behavior.

Teams are rewarded with poker chips for dealing with diversity effectively. At the end of each round, they calculate their productivity, impacted by costs, time and standards. The five standards encompass principles that overcome barriers in valuing diversity. Some of the principles are: openly confronting problems and seeking solutions; being straightforward, open, and honest with unwritten rules; accepting different viewpoints and opinions; and being caring, kind and considerate.

Diversity sometimes produces poor results in the early stages of the game, but results in long-term gain, Hartman said.

Every Kind of Person, he pointed out, is not just for business people. He recommends the game for schools, community groups and synagogues.

INDOOR ADVENTURES

By MARLA KAY
Special to The CJN

If I have to drag my daughter to another bowling party or my son to another video parlor party, I'm going to scream. There has to be another alternative to celebrating your child's birthday other than placing them in front of a machine and feeding it with quarters to keep them entertained. Happily there is.

Steve and Lorrain Powell have recently opened an adventurous and large indoor playground called My Little Town (886-8696).

"We wanted to create an environment that was condusive to children playing more creatively and constructively together, as well as having a unique setting for a birthday celebration," says Powell.

My Little Town is a creative centre that is modelled after a miniature town. It has roadways with foot pedalled cars, a movie theatre which is completely carpeted with 3-tier seating and features currently-released children's videos and movies.

The hair salon gives children the opportunity to style hair with real curlers and blow dryers or give a manicure. The grocery store has a working cash register, shelves with products, grocery carts, even a refrigerator for cold items.

There is also a book shop, music store, car garage and hospital. Each centre provides its own mode of entertainment.

"We also provide costumes of doctors, nurses, firemen and policemen to further emphasize the role playing. This playful interaction stimulates creativity and imagination," says Powell.

On the other side of town there is an athletic centre consisting of an air trampoline that resembles an English double decker bus and a large enclosed wooden structure which has a maze and three different levels of activities. At each level there is a different challenge. A fireman pole, a bridge and a slide into a ball bath.

At another location near the town is the soft play area which is fully padded and thickly carpeted. It was originally geared to 6 months to 24 month olds, but many of the older children enjoy using the soft building blocks or rolling around on the hugh physio balls.

The cafe area comes complete with a snack-bar. Adults can relax, have a coffee and watch their children. There are also highchairs, walkers and baby swings so little people don't have to get stuck in a car seat on the floor.

If you are looking for further creativity for your child other than on the weekends, My Little Town offers creative classes Monday to Friday. Mornings are devoted to Moms & Tots — arts and crafts, creative movement and Storybook Lady. In the afternoon, the same classes are offered to toddlers without their moms. There is a new class set to start called Tot French 101. If that's not enough. My Little Town is also offering aerobic classes for moms on Monday, Wednesday and Friday 10 a.m. - 11 a.m. Babysitting is available at a small charge while mom works out.

Something that's also exciting at My Little Town is its monthly concert series. Each month it features a Canadian children's musical artist. Last month it was Judy and David. On June 5, they will have Sylvia & Sue performing and on July 18, Magic Window Production will entertain as well as teach kids about safety and streetproofing. Tickets are $7 per child or adult, kids 1 year and under are free.

For a party that is geared solely to physical activity, Chris Hanley's Kid's Super Gym (294-9484) is a total gymnastic facility that offers birthday parties, drop-in times and competitive gymnastic classes.

"The competitive gymnastics start at Parent and Tot, as soon as your child can walk," says Hanley. "Structural classes continue in different age categories until we believe they are ready for competition. We also have a handicap program which is conducted on a one to one basis."

Birthday parties at Kid's Super Gym are priced at $85 for up to 10 children and each additional child is $5. This includes one hour in the gym with full use of the equipment and an instructor who plays games with them. There is an eating area where lunch/dinner is served, possibly pizza and cake which may be ordered by the gym.

A new facility soon to be opening at the Promenade Village Shoppes is Funtastikids.

Funtastikids ia a giant indoor playground which provides a safe non-competitive environment that is sure to improve fitness, sharpen motor-skills, build self-confidence, and trigger imagination.

"All children at Funtastikids are treated as if they are our own," says owner Avi Hatuka. "To this end, our customers will be glad to know that security is top priority at all times. With excellent safety measures in place, both children and adults can come and have great times without a worry in the world.

"We like to think of it as a giant activity kingdom where the kids truly rule," says Hatuka. "Our monthly 'Funtastik Calendar' allows them to be as wacky and wild as they wish, and this includes moms and dads too. There will always be a wide variety of entertaining, educational and interactive activities to indulge in and we promise to get even wackier as time goes on."

In addition, Funtastikids is being designed to meet all of your party needs. They will have four private party rooms for rent, balloons and party coordinators to help parents have the best party around. There is a full menu, all kinds of drinks and a whole lot more. Parties may be catered kosher when required.

Lingerie: Beautiful Comfort

By MARLA KAY
Special to The CJN

On her wedding day, it's important that a bride feels beautiful and comfortable in her bridal gown and the lingerie she wears beneath it.

At Lingerie Lines (787-7780), managers Ivonne and Danny Ben Tsur pride themselves on providing a perfect custom-fit for all their customers and brides-to-be.

"We pay special attention to the construction of the bra," says Ben Tsur. "The distribution of the weight is essential to provide maximum comfort and support."

Lingerie Lines carries a complete line of bras starting at size 32A to 54DD. "We offer a regular size or full figured woman the fit she needs and the comfort she desires," says Ben Tsur. "We carry a very high quality line of lingerie called Chantelle from Paris, as well as handmade bras which offer a phenomenal fit from Edith Lances in New York. We have a Canadian line called Elita, which offers panties (control top and light control), sports bras and underwire bras manufactured in 100 per cent cotton lycra."

The bridal section at Lingerie Lines offers a wonderful selection of bustiers with matching panties, merry widows and stockings. For honeymoon attire, there are two-piece gowns and robes incorporating lace, chiffon, satins and organzas. There are beautiful penoir sets, teddys with matching cover-ups from Japanese designer Natori.

At Lingerie Lines you will also find beautiful loungewear, swimwear, socks, tights, pantyhose, aerobic wear, bodysuits, leggings, nighties, pj's and even shoulder pads.

"No woman can resist lingerie that makes her feel young and desirable," says Kathryn's Lingerie (782-6632) owner Susan Klein-Sugar. "The key to the success of my boutique is the personal service we offer and the guarantee of a comfortable custom-fit."

Klein-Sugar always insists on thoroughly fitting the customer to the point where if the garment is ill-fitting, she simply won't sell it to her. This has resulted in Kathryn's achieving a reputation as one of the top five lingerie stores in Toronto.

At this extremely well-stocked lingerie boutique, one may find every make, shape or color foundation garment including bridal wear. One of Kathryn's leading manufacturer/supplier is Romantic Nights. This line specializes in European styling. Their garments are beautifully designed and marvelously constructed of the highest quality fabrics. Kathryn's always prides itself on featuring the latest in European lingerie fashions.

Mariella Ciarlo has owned Intimate Treasures (489-8492) since September 1993, but has been in the lingerie business for over 15 years. This experience has shown her how to please her clientele.

"We specialize in selected better sleepwear at affordable prices," says Ciarlo. "I try to carry a very wide range of different types of lingerie, from bodywear to basic bras and panties to everyday wear. We offer a large variety of fabrics, such as cottons, knits, satins and silks.

"Custom-fitting is a key factor of the personal service we offer," notes Ciarlo. "Our sizing ranges from 32A to 42DD and we carry petite and over-sized sleepwear and bodywear."

At Intimate Treasures they carry an extensive collection of bridal garments that will make every bride feel not only elegant but desirable as well.

Their sleepwear lines are largely Canadian-made — with some imported from the United States and Europe. They include pj's, chemises, long and short nightgowns, baby dolls and teddys, as well as matching robes in comfortable fabrics like terrycloth, satin, cotton and silk.

Outfits like those pictured here are available at most lingerie boutiques.

Four Seasons now offers kosher catering

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Four Seasons Hotel Toronto, (416- 964-0411), a five diamond hotel, now offers kosher catering services for weddings, bar mitzvahs, cocktail parties, conventions or dinners for 70 to 500 people.

Operated under the supervision of the Orthodox division of the Toronto Jewish Congress and approved by the Kashruth Council of Ontario, each menu is custom designed and supervised by executive chef Denis Jaricot.

Catering director Tamir Shanel is in the midst of preparing for the hotel's first kosher wedding in mid-June. He says each week a hotel kitchen is koshered, after which food that has been initially prepared by Zuchter's Catering can be brought in and cooked.

"The Jewish community has patronized us for a long time and we are very pleased that we can now offer kosher parties."

He says kosher meals are based on Four Seasons menus and everything is up to strict standards. Menus can include vegetarian, low-salt or low-fat selections, while another is a lighter, California-style menu. "We go to any length to please our customers," Shanel said.

The June wedding will include hors d'oeuvres like sweet potato spring rolls, potato and green onion crisps with kosher caviar, and beggars' purses filled with hoisen chicken. The appetizer is farfalle pasta with wild mushrooms, basil tomato concasse and toasted pine nuts, followed by a salad of organic Cookstown greens with julienned roasted bell peppers drizzled with balsamic vinaigrette and fresh chives.

The Regency Ballroom at the Four Seasons Hotel Toronto is a modern-day version of the European Crystal Ballroom. This blue and crystal room provides a stately backdrop for any function up to 600 people.

Choice of 12 spacious rooms

The main course will be grilled Atlantic salmon with wild mushrooms and spinach, a medley of baby vegetables and a timbale of basmati rice and cilantro, after which guests will enjoy a dessert of almond tuille with champagne sorbet and assorted fresh berries, and a light sweet table that includes fresh fruit and a selection of cookies.

Functions at the hotel can take place in any of 12 spacious rooms. The Regency Ballroom seats 500, and Windows on the 32nd floor, which seats 190 people, offers a breathtaking view of the city. Multi-function meeting rooms for 10 to 240 are ideal for any size gathering and three windowed suites accommodate up to 12 people. The 380-room hotel, managed by Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts, has received top honors in many international surveys including AAA Five Diamond Award, Institutional Investor's Best Hotels of the World and Conde Nast Traveler's Top 100 Survey and Meeting and Convention 1993 Gold Key Award.

Personal simchah invitations

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Linda Cerullo is getting married in October. She's booked the hall, the caterer, the DJ, and the photo grapher. And her wedding dress has been hanging in her closet for weeks.

She's made all the major decisions for the big day except one. "I'm having a dilemma about invitations," she says. "I can't make up my mind. Barbara has the most beautiful invitations. Each one is more beautiful than the next."

She's referring to Barbara Mortfield (905-738-1232), who has been in the invitation business for 26 years, working from her home while raising her four children. For many years the dining room was her office.

Although her children are grown, her business is still home-based. But now she's in a new house with a real office on the main floor.

Mortfield says she was the first in Toronto to offer discount invitations. She charges 20 per cent less than the catalogue prices and she carries invitations for every budget. She also does customized instant invitations by computer.

Mortfield can save on the cost of creating custom-look invitations from the catalogues, she says. "Everything can be customized." Her motto is "It doesn't have to be expensive. It just has to look expensive."

She says the cost is very important to many people and she checks if her customers are on a budget. "For some people it's not important to spend a lot of money. I show them something good-looking, but simpler."

American invitations are higher-priced than Canadian ones, costing up to twice as much. But Mortfield says many people prefer the American companies because they are more innovative.

She says she's been working closely with Canadian companies to help them redesign their catalogues, and some are achieving the innovative look of American invitations.

That look is currently square-shaped oversized cards. "I believe that the oversized cards look better," Mortfield says. "But they cost twice as much to mail."

And they often get crushed in the mail, she says. To combat this problem she invented ExBendables, acrylic inserts that prevent cards from being bent by the mailperson. She also supplies them to other invitation companies and printers.

Mortfield says she's been in the business so long the people whose wedding invitations she did 15 and 20 years ago are coming back for bar and bat mitzvah invitations for their children.

Invitation House, (593-0519) at 350 Adelaide St. West, in the heart of Toronto's fashion and gallery districts, is another invitation company with a long history. It was started 28 years ago as an offshoot of Kern Stationers Ltd., a commercial printing company.

Ben Kirshenbaum, the owner, saw there was an unfilled need for customized social invitations. He brought his wife, Lillian, into the business to run that division. When their daughter Terry Kirshenbaum finished her business degree she came to work for her parents.

It was supposed to be for a year. But 15 years later she's still there. "I was smitten. I loved it," she says. "They were the best people to work for." She ran Invitation House for 10 years. But for the last three years — following the death of both her parents — she's been running the entire family business.

Kirshenbaum says Invitation House is known for its customized designs. They can do everything on the premises: blind embossing, a colorless raised three-dimensional look; hot stamping foil borders or lettering; thermography, simulated engraving with raised shiny lettering; genuine copper plate engraving and calligraphy.

They can also print art work in several colors and reproduce photographs on paper. "We're happy to add on," Kirshenbaum says. But the extras cost more. They also offer a less expensive alternative — invitations from the standard catalogues.

She says the recession has had an impact on business: more people are on budgets and invitations are not as elaborate. But people are still making parties, she says. "There are always weddings and bar mitzvahs."

She recommends people send out their invitations four weeks in advance to guests in town and five weeks to those out of town. But it's better to give eight weeks' notice in the summer time, Kirshenbaum says, because people often go out of town.

Invitations set the tone of the party, she says. "People are struck when they get something very unusual."

Creating unusual invitations is the goal of designer Sharon Klinghoffer of Continental Expressions (905-660-0311), an offset printing company in Concord. "We try to make things as unique as possible," she says.

Continental Expressions can place orders through the standard catalogues as well as do custom design work on the premises. Along with the more traditional invitations they do faux-painting, hand painted flowers, and hand painted strips to trim the cards.

"We can make them as simple as the Canadian and as magnificent as the American catalogues, if not nicer," Klinghoffer says. "It's not necessary to go to the States. Everything's in Concord."

While it's worth the trip to Concord, many people living in the City of Toronto prefer to shop closer to home. There's a good chance they'll find exactly what they'll need at SendSations (322-5553).

This gift and stationery store, located at 2605 Yonge Street north of Eglinton, has cards and invitations for every budget. The cost of invitations varies considerably.

Company owner Elaine Anisman says traditional customized invitations can cost $1 a card if they're done simply on ecru (ivory) paper, but a single card can also be as high as $15 if there are several layers of paper or cloth such as satin or moire.

With over 100 catalogues SendSations offers customers a huge selection. They also have been given exclusive rights to a very avant-garde line of invitations from a trend-setting American company.

SendSations does computerized pen-and-ink calligraphy for addressing envelopes and customized computer invitations on in-store stationery stock. These cards can be ready in a day. They are often used for baby announcements and graduation, birthday and dinner parties.

"People shouldn't be afraid that invitations are going to be costly," says Anisman. "It's a nice way to start a party. It doesn't have to be a gigantic expense."

Sharon Benjamin, a February-bride-to-be will not spend a lot of money on invitations, because she wants her invitations to be environmentally friendly.

"I don't want 50 million sheets of paper," she says. "I want to limit [the paper] to what's necessary."

But Cerullo (the October bride) says the invitation sets the theme and the mood of the wedding. She wants something pretty with ribbons and bows. And she's willing to spend the extra money.

"If you get a really nice invitation, you're excited. You get a new dress. If the invitation is crappy you put it away in the drawer until [the wedding] comes up. I want people to think about mine."

This invitation is an example of the work available at Invitation House.

I AM MY BELOVED'S
AND MY BELOVED IS MINE

Toronto artist Temmi Ungerman-Sears (785-7888) is a simchah scribe.

Whether it is hand-painted ketubbot (Jewish marriage contracts), bar/bat mitzvah dedications, birth announcements or marriage reaffirmation, Ungerman-Sears' work commemmorates the happier moments of Jewish life.

Ungerman-Sears, 33, has been making one-of-a-kind ketubbot since 1981. She discovered the Jewish folk art form while spending her third year as a York University fine arts student at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. She remembers wandering through the Mea Shearim district, tracking down the traditional materials needed for her brother's ketubah, her first.

She now works from her uptown home, surrounded by the painted Balinese cats, Turkish kilims and other art forms that inspire her.

Increasingly, that inspiration can be seen in the personalized reaffirmation of marriage documents she designs for milestone anniversaries. Husbands, wives and grown children have commissioned her to produce pieces marking a couple's 25th or 50th year together.

"People want to give a partner or parent something unique," says the self-taught artist.

"What can you buy your parents after they've been together 50 years and have everything? You can buy them lawn furniture . . . or an original, meaningful work of art."

And they are original. Clients have brought in carpet swatches, embroidery threads, woolen scarves and family photos for Ungerman-Sears to work around. She spends two hours with them pouring over history books, Judaica samples and her portfolio, helping clients choose the shape, text and colors of their document.

A glance through that same portfolio reveals richly painted, exquisitely detailed and harmoniously colored pieces that run the gamut from circular to squared, traditional to modern and simple to ornate. Texts restating the marriage vows are in Hebrew, English or a combination of both. Quotes from the Song of Songs or the Book of Ruth float around the borders, as do doves, lions and other symbols chosen by the client.

Ungerman-Sears says she typically uses eight to 15 colors for each work, with gold and silver paints specially brought over from Israel adding shine. She works on poster-sized French parchament. Each document takes between 60 and 100 hours to complete, and ranges in price from $400 to $1,500 (she requires a 30 per cent deposit).

Her involvement doesn't end when the paint dries: Ungerman-Sears will help select a frame at the framing store because "that finishing touch is important."

But each of her works has its own special touches, like the marriage reaffirmation Ungerman-Sears did for her aunt and uncle, Yetta and Harry Ungerman. It was her 50th wedding anniversary gift to them.

Within the tablet frame is an original graphic of Jerusalem's Old City done in yellow, red, pink, blue and green. Beneath that is a rich purple chupah with a photograph of the newlyweds underneath. The English text wishes that their lives "continue to be intertwined in love, respect and tenderness."

These sentiments appear in another reaffirmation, this one to commemmorate 25 years of marriage for Carole and Harold Wolfe. Carole Wolfe commissioned the work — a geometric design with intricate floral patterns and an Islamic flavor — as an anniversary present for her husband.

The black, green, red and pink colors were chosen to coordinate with the family home, and the English text chosen to include the names of the couple's children:

"May their times of joy be limitless and find them satisfied in the closeness of family relationships with their children, Lisie, Jodie and Jeffrey."

A restatement of the couples' marriage vows is a big part of the reaffirmation document. Ungerman-Sears was commissioned to do her first reaffirmation for Bess and Philip Godfrey by their son, former Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey. Framed within two arches, the text reads:

REAFFIRMATION OF MARRIAGE
חדוש קדושין
On the 27th day of June, 1991
corresponding to the Hebrew date Tammuz 15, 5751
YETTA AND HARRY UNGERMAN
have reaffirmed this day their commitment to the covenant of marriage. May their lives continue to be intertwined in love, respect and tenderness. May they be united in faith and hope and be a support for one another in days of trouble. May their times of joy be limitless and find them satisfied in the closeness of family relationships.
This day they pledged themselves anew in the words from the Song of Songs
אני לדודי ודודי לי
I am my beloveds and my beloved is mine

"Please remain my wife in the community of Israel. I will continue to honor and respect you, living with you as your husband. . .To this the wife consented." The Godfrey children witnessed the document. An identical document was commissioned for the 50th wedding anniversary of Paul Godfrey's in-laws.

Ungerman-Sears, who also is a private art psychotherapist, works as a yoga instructor at the Jewish Community Centre downtown, and has a fourth career mothering 17-month-old Jeremy and the child she is expecting in July, says there is a two- to three-month waiting period for her work "but you know an anniversary is coming up six months in advance."

Beautiful Bridal Attire

By MARLA KAY
Special to The CJN

The bridal season is once again upon us and this year's brides, like all other brides, want to be beautiful and elegant.

"This year's brides are seeking a softer more natural look for their wedding gown," says Ines DiSanto, owner and designer of Chez Moi Bridal Boutique (856-9115). "The lines are of a more delicate and intricate nature. The pluses of the body are emphasized and the negatives are hidden."

The biggest fashion statement this year is the empire look from Europe. The cut of the dress is a bustline look with a very fitted waist and long flowing skirt. The fabric emphasis is on chiffons, organza and silk. Colors such as mint and pale pinks have also been incorporated.

"I am still getting numerous requests for beading," states DiSanto. "I design the dress with more pearls and smaller beads for a lighter look. Even headpieces are quested to have less heavy crystals and beads and to incorporate more flowers. Simpler less elaborate is becoming the look that brides want. The gown colors are evolving away from the starch white to more creamy, ivory or pearl white."

For the mothers of the bride, a simpler look without heavy beading is more fashionable this season. They want the emphasis to centre on the person in the dress, not just on the dress.

Bridesmaids seem to have one common complaint. "I'll never wear this dress again." This year DiSanto has suggested colors and designs that wil suit each individual figure in colors that will coordinate with the bridal party but can also be worn on other occasions.

Edith's Fashions (633-4222), specializes in fine quality evening and daytime wear, wedding apparel, shabbat and yom tov outfits and clothing for your bar/bat mitzvah.

Edith's carries both Canadian and European designs and offers choices of quality clothing to suit any taste. Edith personally travels to New York and Europe four times per year to keep up to date with latest styles, colors, shapes and sillhouettes.

Milliner Gail Osaduke has designed countless hats and does most of Edith's important hats for weddings or shul. Each is totally unique so that you will never see your hat on another woman.

Whether purchasing a special outfit from Edith's or accessorizing one of your own favorites, your hat is designed especially for you in colors and fabrics to compliment your ensemble. All millinery work is hand crafted and will require two to three weeks to complete, although when possible, Gail will try to accommodate rush orders.

Dress available at Big, Bold & Beautiful Boutique.

Gail is an independent milliner who studied with Ellen Peterson. She understands the sculptured elements of hats and the way they should fit. "Trends are moving towards simple silluouettes but creative use of fabric, i.e pleating and draping," says Osaduke. "In custom headpieces, we're seeing the same thing. Fabric forms the focal point of the headpiece and beading is more of an accent. Tiaras are still popular but many brides favor the softer look of fabric."

"We believe the best customer service is achieved when everything is done on the premises," Edith says. "Our friendly, knowledgeable staff will assist you in selecting the perfect fit, and our first class designers and seamstresses ensure that every outfit or gown looks and feels as though it were custom made for you. Nothing is ever sent out. From the tiniest flower girl to that special grandmother, there really is no need to look any further."

"Soft, pretty and feminine tend to take over this season in bridal wear for the larger bride," says Big, Bold & Beautiful Boutique owner Jackqueline Hope. "Delicate details, a trim of French lace, a border of seed pearls around the neck and sleeves, lily appliques and dresses in candlelight brocade with a little or no train, seem to be the favorite requests. Only for the very elaborate wedding does the large-size bride choose a heavily beaded and sequined gown."

Square, scooped or sweetheart necklines are popular for the plus-sized bride. Many brides prefer off-the-shoulder wedding gowns. The open neckline adds a very soft, beautiful look to the bride, framing her face. For the spring/summer bride, this is the best option. A closed neckline or a high neckline tends to make the bride's face and bustline look much bigger.

The sleeves on a wedding dress for the larger bride should be in proportion to the rest of her body. If the bride has bigger hips, the sleeve should be fuller and puffier to balance her hips. If the plus-size bride is smaller in the hips with a bigger bust, the sleeve should be less puffy and fuller to de-emphasize the hip area.

A dropped waist or a V-waistline is suggested and can be very complimentary on a larger bride. If her tummy is bigger, a dropped waist should not be used, but a V-waist would be the best choice.

A crinoline is really a personal choice for the bride. At times the bride feels the crinoline makes her look larger and that it merely adds bulk. At other times a crinoline could virtually balance a bigger bust and make her waist look smaller.

"Many brides at Big, Bold & Beautiful," says Hope, "choose a wedding dress that they can use again after the wedding. The choices abound. Any dress in a brocade fabric dyes up beautifully to be used for after-the-wedding purposes. A cocktail dress in satin-back crepe in white or ivory is an excellent choice for second time brides.

"We suggest fresh flowers in the hair, a simple but elegant headpiece which compliments the bride's dress, keeping the style of the headpiece with the simplicity of the gown."

BRIDAL SHOES

Shoes available Peter Fox Shoes.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If the shoe fits comfortably — wear it.

That's Jack Herman's advice for brides-to-be choosing wedding shoes. Herman, the owner of Shoe Mart (597-9252), a discount shoe store at 197 Spadina Ave., has been in the shoe business for 23 years.

"If (brides) are going to be on their feet for a long time comfort is more important than looks," he says. He recommends brides avoid very high heels and choose lower heeled pumps.

Herman carries eight different styles of satin shoes, which come in all widths, including D-width. Many women have told him the shoes are very comfortable, he says. "I'm even dying a pair for my 83-year-old mother to wear at my son's wedding."

Herman specializes in dying satin shoes. With 510 colors to choose from, he says he can match any shade. He sells satin handbags and glue-on appliques and ornaments which can also be dyed.

The satin shoes cost between $35 and $40 a pair and there is a $6 charge for dying them. Herman carries an old-fashioned looking lace boot for $69, but it is not nearly as popular as the traditional satin pumps.

Brides-to-be looking for traditional wedding shoes will not find them at Peter Fox Shoes (960-5572) in the Manulife Centre, which specializes in period shoes.

"It's a romantic look," says Betty Lamanna, co-owner of the store. The 18th-century-court slipper, a satin shoe with bows and hourglass shaped heels, as well as the front lace-up mid-calf boots in peau de soi are popular with brides, she says.

Brides tend to prefer the soft look of cloth shoes because they go better with a gown than leather, Lamanna says. "When you put a leather shoe beside a soft silk gown it looks too hard."

She says Peter Fox shoes, specially designed for comfort, are worn by many women in period theatre productions like Show Boat and Phantom of the Opera.

But this comfort doesn't come cheap. Shoes cost at least $300 and boots start at $550.

Shoes may not show under a wedding gown but they can affect how a bride walks and feels, Lamanna says. "If your feet hurt on your wedding day it will show on your face."

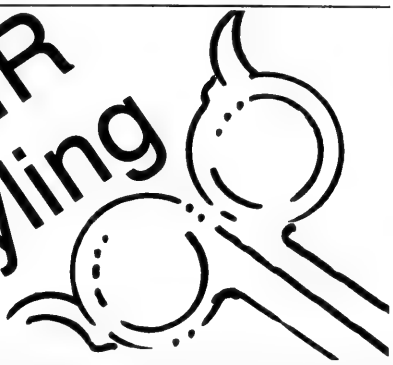
HAIR Styling



Hair styling professionals like Marc Leoni of Leoni Hair Design (905-886-8073) and John Di Bratto of John Di Bratto Hair Design (222-4247) are at your service to create that special "up-do" or soft, loose style to help put the finishing touch on any special occasion.

Having been in the industry, both as stylists and as an independent salon owners for a combination of 20 years, these professionals offer some dos and don'ts to help you choose hairstyles and colors that work.

"First, always take into account your own tastes. Even if up-dos are all the rage for partywear, don't feel like you're stuck with this look. We can create soft permed styles and loose styles that may be more flattering to you," says Leoni.

"Before choosing a style, always look at the shape of your face, your hair color and texture, as well as the type of outfit and neckline you'll be wearing. Most importantly, you must be sure to condition your hair properly so that the color, texure and style work well."

Di Bratto, whose salon is located at the south-east corner of Yonge and Steeles, and who specializes in hair color and styles for weddings and special events offers this advice: "No matter what's in for spring this year, choose something that will make you feel comfortable throughout the evening.

"Make sure that it's a style that won't make you feel self-conscious but rather something that complements your own personal style. And most importantly, choose a look that is somewhat classic, especially as a bride, because you'll want to enjoy looking back on your wedding pictures in the years to come."

While some top fashion magazines say that white blonde and short, layered bobs are in for spring, both stylists warn their clients not to fall prey to fashion dictates. For most people, classic styles and natural shades — rich browns, auburns and several shades of foil highlighting — and are most complementary. Also, look for movement in hair rather than curl, and natural, healthy colors that don't look artificial.

"In my salon, I do all the color myself and always add at least two or three different shades for a more textured and a more natural look," says Leoni, whose partner and brother, Bruno Leoni, and sister, Mary Marsico, assist him in running the business located on Steeles in Thornhill. Leoni Hair Design also offers manicures, electrolysis, facials, waxing and more in the 1,000 square foot salon.

"We have been serving our clients for as long as 22 years in different locations. Our motto has always been 'We aim to please' and it's worked for us," says Leoni.

Unique gift-giving ideas

Three Toronto artisans are offering unique gifts for the upcoming wedding and party season.

Michele Dodick (781-3338) of Dodick Design on Eglinton Avenue West near the Allen Expressway sells hand-crafted ceramic ware at reasonable prices.

"My motto is 'Bringing art to your table," Dodick says.

Inside the bright blue storefront, hand stencilled walls help support shelves bearing Dodick's unique works. Platters and plates run between $30 and $90, depending on the complexity of the pattern.

Dodick, 32, is self-taught. Floral, animal and geometric designs are executed in bold colors or pastels, but Dodick's flair is most evident in her portraits and still lifes.

A Santa Fe palette is used for flower pots (12.95), while candlesticks, picture frames and assorted tchatchkes come in every color of the rainbow. Decorated vegetable trays and pitchers ($50 to $65) are perfect for summer barbeques.

Dodick, who has been at her present location for under two months, is expanding her line of 250 objects with menorahs and seder plates (both are $90).

"I can't keep enough Judaica in stock," Dodick says.

Diane Brown (905-889-8517) came up with her idea for a "simchah sack" after attending a family wedding in Baltimore.

That was when she saw, for the first time, the richly detailed satin sack containing a light bulb for the groom to smash. The wedding couple keeps the sack as a souvenir.

Brown, 46, experimented with different fabrics before settling on beaded and embroidered cream silk shantung she uses now. The sacks, embellished with seed pearls and cream satin ribbons, sell for $25. A foam core prevents the broken glass from poking through the fabric.

Brown, who says she honed her skills teaching arts and crafts to preschoolers at the JCC Valley, checked with Rabbi Stephen Saltzman at Adath Israel to make sure the chandelier bulb inside the simchah sack was okay to use.

"He told me, 'That's all we do anyway,'" Brown says.

Brown also makes a linen napkin embroidered with the wedding couple's initials to use for the first dance ($20), and is thinking of creating another sack to hold the cuttings from baby's first hair cut.

Judd Shemesh (905-764-73367) makes dazzling glass Judaica.

The Iraqi-born Shemesh, 53, turned his former hobby into a full-time vocation last year when he began making clear or colored glass candlesticks ($249 to $499). menorahs ($299 to $499) and colored mezzuzot ($89.95 to $99.95).

His work can be found at Toronto stores: Bronson's, Cantu Furniture and Interiors, Israel's and Matana Judaica; and in Florida.

PARTY'S HERE !

Let me entertain you

By MARLA KAY
Special to The CJN

When you plan an engagement, anniversary, graduation, small wedding or bar/bat mitzvah party, don't assume that musical entertainment is unnecessary because the affair is small.

This is a common misconception. Even if your party is small in numbers, there still must be some type of musical background to ensure the mood of the party is festive.

Rhonda Silver (282-5860) has been involved in the music industry for over 10 years as a songwriter and composer as well as an entertainer.

Rhonda Silver

Her past musical career highlights have included an appearance on the Tonight Show with Johnny Carson, and as a regular on the CBC-TV series Music Hop hosted by Alex Trebek of Jeopardy. She has charted several major hits, including Neil Sedaka's One more Mountain to Climb with Dr. Music and singer-songwriter Brenda Russell. She sang backup on Bob Seger's classic Night Moves. She has appeared as a regular on the Thicke of the Night show with Alan Thicke. Signed to A&M Records, Rhonda and Mike Degazio were nominated for a Juno award as Canadian Country Duo of the Year.

She has augmented her very busy musical career by performing at smaller simchahs and providing guests with a vast musical repertoire.

"It's very economical to use someone such as myself at a smaller gathering," says Silver. "I take up much less needed space and with the use of my keyboard synthesizer, I can produce music that sounds like a full band without all the equipment and amplifiers.

"When I'm booked for a function, I usually meet with the client and check over the location of the party so that I can assess the best position for myself. I certainly don't want to be too conspicuous or obstructive. I want to add excitement and ambience to an occasion, not detract from it. I will also discuss the type of music that the client feels would be appropriate for their guests and of course I always take requests."

Rhonda Silver likes to be referred to as "a one woman band;" she is enjoying much success in this new extension of her career and says that the overwhelming response she has received to her small ads in The CJN have been fantastic.

For all your party rentals

When you choose to throw a party at a banquet hall or a function room, more often than not, it can have a very institutional look and feel.

The room may be cavernous, the walls bare, and the chairs and tables lacking in warmth and style.

Why not give your next bash a more personalized look, and your own special signature, by renting linens and chair covers in your favorite colors and styles?

Master Linen (665-6151) at Dufferin and Highway 7 is one of only two companies in the city that specialize exclusively in party linen rentals. According to partner Scott Sandford, his company is targeted at an upscale, high-end market.

"We cater to everyone," says Sandford. "From the small at-home party to the larger banquet hall, we have something for everyone's taste and budget. What we call our low-end linens, the Princess Line, are 100 per cent cotton which gives them a crisper, more expensive look than the standard polyesters. On the higher end of the spectrum, we offer our Royal Line which is 100 per cent cotton Belgian Damask. Both lines come in 30 different colors."

What's hot in linens this year? "Believe it or not, white is always our most popular color," Sandford explains. "And our whites, in nicely weighted fabrics, are very rich and elegant looking. There's been some interest in a floral or chintz look which Master Linen is just starting to offer. And there are always interesting requests for such themes as cowboy parties, in which case we'll suggest linens in orange and browns."

While Sandford and partner Tony Bennett bought the business only a year ago, sales have been great; they anticipate that the next six months — May to December — will be hopping. Having come from the upscale restaurant linen supply business, both partners have a lot of experience in the industry. And they believe that offering upscale linens for one-time special events — birthday parties, weddings, bar mitzvahs, confirmation parties — is the way to go.

"At an average of $30 to $50 for a home party and anywhere from $100 to $200 for a banquet room party, it's definitely more cost-effective to rent your linens. We'll deliver and pick-up and we send only the finest quality goods. There is never a stain, a patch or a wrinkle in sight."

Another high quality, high-end rental company specializing in table covers, accessories and chair covers is Chair Decor Etc. (905-731-9217), owned and operated by partners and sisters Phyllis Rich and Mary Bien.

Since 1990, Chair Decor, previously run under the name Sculptchair, has earned a reputation for elegance and style. They offer specialty cloths such as tone on tone, embossed, satin and antique lace for a Victorian look. And through color, style and accessories, they match the cloths with chair covers that have names like "Opera Cover," "Ballroom Cover" and "Gold Lame Halfback," all designed to fit on any armless banquet chair or folding chair typically used at functions.

Their cloths and covers are manufactured in Toronto and more recently in the Orient as well. And their rentals are available across Canada as well as in the United States. In fact, it was one of their New York clients who named the "Opera Covers" because they reminded him of an opera's elegance. Another American client recently asked them to do a Sephardi Wedding for 1,000 people at New York's Waldorf Astoria.

"We're always adding new looks and items to our line. And we are happy to take specialty orders as well. If a client has a look in mind, we'll create it for them as long as it's within a price range that others will pay," says Rich.

The man behind the beak

By MARLA KAY
Special to The CJN

As a party consultant, I'm often called upon to come up with a theme to incorporate into the celebration of a bar/bat mitzvah. The overall favorite has been sports, in particular baseball — featuring the Toronto Blue Jays.

Depending on the requests made by the family, I develop baseball into the invitations, room decor, speeches and candlelighting ceremonies.

For every bar/bat mitzvah, I try to suggest something that will add a little more excitement to the celebration. It could be indoor fireworks or a laser light show. When it's a baseball-theme party, there is nothing more exciting than the appearance of the one and only B. J. Birdy, the official mascot of the Toronto Blue Jays baseball team.

In 1979 B. J. Birdy was created by and has only ever been performed and owned by Kevin Shanahan. "Right from the time of the inception of the character, B. J. Birdy has always been involved in the bar/bat mitzvah circuit," says Shanahan. "Although, there was one occasion at a Jewish wedding, the groom had accidentally injured himself and was in a body cast. B. J. Birdy was hired to perform the first dance with the bride."

The appearance of B. J. Birdy at a party usually begins with an announcement of a special visitor to the bar/bat mitzvah and would they please come to the centre of the dance floor. The theme song Okay Blue Jays, Let's Play Ball is played and the guests begin to sing and clap and then B. J. Birdy bursts into the room and gets everybody psyched up and excited.

"The most common reaction I get is shock and dumbfoundedness from the bar/bat mitzvah child," states Shanahan. "This turns into sheer joy once they realize what's happening."

What really gets your guests excited is when B. J. Birdy shouts to the band and to everyone, "Let's Horah." Once the horah begins, B. J. Birdy encourages people to lift him and the bar/bat mitzvah onto chairs. This is great fun for everyone and looks fabulous on your video and in your pictures. Once the excitement peaks, B. J. Birdy exits the room and will pose for pictures with the bar/bat mitzvah and their family or with their friends.

"I've never had to actually seek out appearance dates for the Bird," says Shanahan. "Word of mouth is my greatest form of advertising, and of course, party consultants help too."

B. J. Birdy's usual appearance time is 20-30 minutes and costs $300 plus G.S.T.

It is important to note that Shanahan is the performer, creator and sole owner of the B. J. Birdy and there can be no substitutes or similarities.

Videographers...

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

Between the three of them, they have attended over 800 weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, birthday and anniversary parties. Popular guys they may be, but Greg Henderson, Randy Maxwell and Abe Salzman usually don't have to bring a gift. They're the videographers.

Henderson, 25, is the owner of Video Magic (975-1528). His clientele is made up mostly of corporations like Nestle, Sears and Hiram Walkers, who hire him and his team of four cameramen/editors to produce training videos. But Henderson has attended his share of simchahs, too, in the two and a half years since he began Video Magic.

Some of those simchahs have been weddings, for which Henderson has a comprehensive package starting at $995. Two cameramen are on hand to tape the photo shoot, the wedding ceremony and the reception. Special music, photos and effects chosen by the client are added later: Henderson invites clients to come to his studio in midtown Toronto to watch a rough edit and stay for a bite to eat. He can produce the final product in five to six weeks.

Clients choose between a 2½-hour wedding video or a 45-minute highlight version. "You fall asleep watching two and a half hours — two and a half hours is a feature film," Henderson says. A shorter video doesn't include the entire wedding ceremony, "but I guarantee you, in 90 per cent of the cases, that part of the video is fast forwarded anyway." He says clients can go to the raw footage included with the shorter video if they want to see the chupah again. Henderson is taking bookings for the summer.

Maxwell of All Event Video (254-9999) in Thornhill doesn't go the short route. But with four cameramen, three tape editors and other assistants, Maxwell can finish a full-length wedding or bar mitzvah video in one week. "I can even do it in 24 hours for relatives going back the next day to Israel and the like," he says.

Various packages available

Maxwell, 40, says in the 12 years he has been capturing simchahs on film video taping has grown in popularity. He says it is a cost-effective way of preserving the

PARTY'S HERE !

"Rockin' On" to the varied tunes of a DJ

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

At a recent trade-show of party services, two women planning bar and bat mitzvahs came to see the displays. They hadn't chosen the dates of their simchahs nor the party themes. But they were very certain about the music.

They're both planning to book Corey Mandell.

"My son wants Corey Mandell. He's the king. They [the kids] all want him," said the woman making the bar mitzvah. Her friend, who is planning a bat mitzvah, nodded her head in agreement. "My daughter wants him too."

Mandell, 24, has been a DJ for seven years. He owns Mandell Entertainment Group (905-886-4000) — a DJ company which employs 35 part-time DJs and dancers and three full-time staff.

The company also does party planning, providing decor — balloons centre pieces and flowers — for simchas and corporate functions.

Renee Birnbaum, the theme party coordinator, had been an independent party decorator. But she teamed up with Mandell two and a half years ago and has set up shop at his Richmond Hill headquarters.

About 65 per cent of Mandell's business comes from weddings, bar or bat mitzvahs, 20 per cent from high school dances sponsored by the Toronto Sun, and 15 per cent from corporate functions and sweet sixteens.

During the busy season — spring and fall — the company averages 80 to 100 parties a month. Mandell says he does more bar mitzvahs than any other DJ and he is often booked a year in advance. His more popular DJs are also in high demand.

Mandell credits his company's popularity to the fact that he and his DJs put on a show. "Our DJs put entertainment first," he says.

In his element — Corey Mandell is pictured here with the equipment he uses to motivate even the shyest dancer. (Photography by Mark Stern Photography)

He sends two DJs to every party. One takes care of the music and lighting, while the other one interacts with the crowd. They may organize activities like line dancing and they are sometimes accompanied by dancers who help get the crowd onto the dance floor.

Mandell also offers technical entertainment. Karoake, video and laser shows and pyrotechnics (indoor fireworks) are some of the technical options that can be added to the basic $495 package. The DJs' fee vary according to their individual popularity.

Mandell says DJ work doesn't feel like a job. "It's more of a fun experience. Where can you get a full-time job going to parties?".

The DJ sits down with the hosts before the party to choose the music and theme songs. They carry a wide range of music from international to today's hottest hits.

Mandell says he can gauge if a party is going well by the number of people dancing. "When the adults and kids are enjoying the music equally and you have a packed dance floor you know you're doing something right."

Danny Pollak (905-731-7585), the leader of the Select Band, and a DJ, also judges the success of a party by the dancing. "When the dance floor is packed I can tell people are enjoying themselves. I can see it in their faces," he says.

Pollak, 41, has been in the music business for 29 years. Before emigrating to Canada in 1980 he was a well-known musician in Israel and one of the first Israeli DJs for weddings and bar mitzvahs.

He says many Israelis switched from using bands to DJs because it was more cost effective. And it's the same in Canada. "For the price of two musicians you can have the whole affair," Pollak says.

But he cautions against skimping on the cost of the DJ. "The lowest price may not be the best value if you're looking for quality," he says. He warns that DJs charging very little for their services may not know their music nor use good equipment. Pollak charges between $450 and $550 a night.

He says his versatility as a musician gives him an edge as a DJ — he's familiar with a wide range of music and he knows what to play to set the mood for a party.

He consults with the hosts about their choice of music before a simchah. He also has a video of himself so potential clients can see a sample of what he does.

While Pollak caters to the over-thirty crowd he has music to suit every taste. With 900 tapes in 13 languages he carries everything from the Latin classics for tangos and lambadas, to today's top hits.

He prides himself on his collection of Israeli and Jewish music . "I can do a whole Orthodox simchah with tapes. No one else [in Toronto] does it," he says.

He advises people to choose their DJs and musicians carefully, because music makes the affair. "If the food's not good people will eat it or they won't," he says. "But if the music's not good they won't stay. It's the music that keeps them there."

Planning parties for the curious children

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

Since I am neither a parent nor a child, I was somewhat at a loss when my editor handed me a copy of Einstein's Science Parties: Easy Parties for Curious Kids.

"Review this," she said.

I took the slim, soft-cover book ($14.95) home and quickly realized that Einstein's Science Parties goes where no other children's entertainment manual has gone before.

First of all, the idea. Authors Shar Levine and Allison Grafton of Vancouver propose an end to the tyranny of Chuck E. Cheese birthday parties and designer loot bags. "Why hire a clown?" they ask. "Throw a science party instead."

Why not indeed. With Einstein's Science Parties as a guide, one can put together fun, economical and educational parties at home with little fuss. It is also useful for teachers and youth group leaders.

The book outlines 14 themed parties for kids aged 4 to 12. Each party comes with a complete script, invitations to photocopy and recommendations for dress-up or mess-up clothing. All of the parties are between one and 1½ hours.

The 100-page book also has advice on food, photos and stage fright. "Being an entertainer for children isn't that hard," coax the authors. "It's like being with a strange dog: don't show fear."

The rest of the book is equally straightforward. Grafton and Levine walk you through the set-up and clean-up for each party, making it very clear that parties like Slime Time, with its homemade silly putty, and the papier mache of Color Your World are best taken outdoors.

They also include checklists for each party. Some of the ingredients are bizarre, like the laxatives needed to make "vampire blood" in the Mad Scientists party or the glycerin used in a number of experiments.

Others are potentially harmful, like the nail polish dripped onto plastic insects in Fossils and Dinos. While Levine and Grafton are careful to remind everyone to wash their hands before eating, adults should make extra sure that only the prepared food gets ingested.

Not all the party themes appealed to me. I thought an I Spy afternoon would be a little boring and the Bubble Blast potentially frustrating: the authors' special trick for blowing soap bubbles against a table seems an exercise in futility.

I decided to run the parties by my 7-year-old brother Jeffrey for the kid view.

Jeffrey, a Grade 1 student at Bialik Hebrew Day School, only liked two of the 14 ideas: Fossils and Dinos, where kids create their own prehistoric artifacts; and Lemon Aide, in which the citrus fruit is used to clean pennies, write invisible messages and light a flashlight bulb as part of a crude battery.

He turned his nose up at the Mad Scientists ("not my style," he explained) and had no desire to make candles in Eau d'Odor, since he did that on a long-ago trip to the Riverdale Zoo.

That was Jeffrey. My 8-year-old cousin Stephen weighed in with a completely different opinion on which parties were cool. "Slime Time sounds good," he told me.

Stephen, in Grade 3 at Bialik, also liked the sound of the sleepover party Science at Night and the Mad Scientists.

What he didn't like, nor did Jeffrey, was the thought of eating green scrambled eggs, purple milk and orange bread as part of Eat Your Experiments. They thought it was disgusting. I concurred.

Einstein's Science Parties is a well thought out book whose time has come. Innovative and educational, the parties will entrance children with the "magic" of the simple science experiments. Maybe it's hoping for too much, but someday even purple milk could beat out a man in a giant mouse costume.

event at a time when affairs are becoming simpler.

"People are going away from bands, guests lists have shrunk, centrepieces are disappearing, as are elaborate invitations. And after the party's over, all you've got left are the pictures and the videos."

Maxwell offers bar and bat mitzvah video pacakges starting at $449, and wedding packages beginning at $800. He is booked through the summer.

Lip-synching

Others don't need much advance notice. "You can call me the night before," jokes Salzman of Video Affairs (905-889-0909). The Thornhill-based Salzman can produce a simchah video in three weeks, with prices ranging from $995 to $1,500.

But Salzman also offers a unique product: a rock video staring the bride and groom, or the bat mitzvah girl. For $400, Salzman will take clients on location and capture them lip-synching and mugging for the camera.

That's what he did last year for a couple in their early 20s, who bounced around singing You're The One That I Want (from the musical Grease); the six-minute video was later played at their wedding. The entire family of one bar mitzvah boy got into the act for his video, singing along to Hang On To What We've Got by Frankie Valli, as well as to another Grease favorite, We Go Together.

On video, at least.

Advice from party experts

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

Party consultants Marla Kay and Nina Linder Wilder make their living running around like chickens with their heads cut off.

Party planners take care of the niggly details involved in each simchah so the party givers can enjoy themselves like any other guest.

"You need somebody to look after everything," said Kay (905-882-2042), who has been a party planner for 12 years.

Marla Kay

"If there's no consultant, the hostess or bride is running around like a chicken without a head, instead of enjoying the simchah."

And the details can be niggly. Linder (483-6807), 31, has been planning mostly weddings for the past four years. She rattles off the contents of her emergency kit.

"Buttons, Static Guard, Rolaids, Aspirin, extra panty hose, curlers, hairspray, safety pins, nail clippers, cotton balls, scissors and a cassette of marching music, in case God forbid something should happen to the person hired to play."

Linder offers two levels of service. For $700 she will help plan the whole affair, or for $450 she will concentrate on just the wedding and rehearsal. She says the abbreviated package was the popular choice for the eight couples she helped last year.

Kay, 38, offers nothing less than 24-hour service for a $750 flat rate. "When I take a simchah on, it's like my own."

Of the 38 parties Kay planned in 1993, 60 per cent were weddings, with bar and bat mitzvah celebrations making up the difference.

She goes to the last fitting of the bridal dress to prevent last-minute difficulties like buttons that won't stay buttoned, or improperly tied bustles. She also helps write speeches, mounting the typed notes on cue cards for the emcee and others.

Nina Linder

Kay has worked with all segments of the Jewish community — Reform to Orthodox, Ashkenazi and Sephardi — and planned parties for 20 guests or 900.

Linder has seen weddings grow smaller over the past four years. She says celebrants are moving away from the large synagogues towards smaller venues like estate homes or private clubs.

She has also helped organize some novel weddings, including one last year that featured an Elvis impersonator as a surprise gift from the bride to her husband. The look-alike played three songs, and Linder says everyone was on their feet dancing, clapping and singing along.

"Of course everyone wants to do something different," she says, "but it's the people that make the party."

Yard Birds chirp the happy news

By MARLA KAY
Special to The CJN

You are celebrating a very special event or milestone in your life and you feel like shouting the news to the entire neighborhood.

Sharna and Ira Florence have replaced the shouting and created 8-foot-high message characters called Yard Birds (905-669-7617).

"It's funny how the birth of a newborn baby can also act as the inspiration for the birth of a new line of 8-foot-tall front yard storks," says Florence. "Halli, our first born, was just that spark in November of 1992."

Sharna and Ira, both graduates of a design and marketing college where they met, decided to use their talents to produce Baby Announcer storks each with its own personality. Hence the birth of Yard Birds.

Today, you can choose from their delightful Baby Announcer creations — delivery storks which are available in pink or blue: a very feminine Ballerina stork or a sporty Baseball stork; a graceful Figure Skater or, for winter deliveries, a Hockey Player.

Each stork comes carrying a Birth Announcement Sack that the parents get to keep, telling all passersby, the baby's name, birthweight and birthdate. It's great for hanging in the new baby's room.

Sharna Florence reports that about 80 per cent of the renters are husbands surprising their wives with a special thank you on their arrival at home from the hospital. The others are either grandparents, family or friends. Most rentals have been for three to five days, but one new mother was so pleased with her Ballerina stork that she paid to have it remain for a full three weeks. The parents of triplets ordered three storks — one for each of their three girls.

Ira Florence, who does most of the installations dressed specially in the distinctive Yard Birds' vest and hat, says that customers usually comment, "I had no idea these storks were so big, they sure do attract a lot of attention.

Babies are not the only ones deserving of attention. Yard Birds have added a new line of Party Characters to help their customers celebrate birthdays and anniversaries.

You can now choose from these whimsical, eight-foot-tall Party Characters: An Old Goat — a handsome fellow proclaiming "Happy Birthday y'old goat!" A Very "Ladylike" Cow — asking "Holy cow, you're how old?" A Crocodile — jumping out of the bullrushes, great for a Surprise Party. A Roller Blading Bird — very sweet for a little girl's party. A Roller Dinosaur — very cool/hip character for a little guy's party, and a Champagne Bottle — complete with fluted glass. Each comes carrying a congratulatory sign (the honoree gets to keep this) announcing their special occasion to all passersby.

Beautiful blossoms enhance any simchah

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

Spring has sprung, and with it have come the beautiful blossoms and foliage of the season. The beauty of flowers can do much to enhance the atmosphere at a party.

Florists are an integral part of any function. They are the artist who sets the scene and can add the right touch to transform a hall into a garden of elegance and natural beauty.

Bruce Philpott Statements in Flowers (968-7052) is well known for exquisite, delicate work. Owner Bruce Philpott has worked in the flower industry for 40 years. He not only knows flowers, he understands them.

"My feeling with flowers," he says, "is to take them as they are and not distort them. I think flowers should speak for themselves, they should not be tortured or distressed." For example putting flowers into a line arrangement forces them to go in a direction that perhaps they're not accustomed to.

Philpott has provided the floral arrangements for the Juno awards for the last 10 years. He works with many different materials like colorful foils, tissues and lights to create different effects. His centrepieces are always different and he doesn't limit them to flowers. Artichokes and green grapes have been used together to create a fresh, perky look.

His use of arrangements is not limiting either. After a decorated chupah has served its purpose in the ceremony, he may move it and use it over a sweet table. Philpott uses silk flowers when budget restrictions require it, as is sometimes the case with fundraising functions. He believes though that you can always have flowers in season that work for you — flowers like tulips, lilies, freesias. The bottom line according to Philpott, is that flowers should be "natural in feeling, natural in look, natural in flowers."

Frank Rea, owner of Forget Me Not Flower Shop (905-845-8996) in Oakville is always able to get an abundance of fresh flowers. He gets a lot of his supplies from the Niagara Peninsula where they're locally grown, cost him less and are very fresh. Some of the flower growers from that region don't even sell their produce in Toronto.

Rea has worked in the industry for 14 years. His work as a flower arranger has appeared in Canadian Living magazine and in books. He is a four-time winner in the Ontario regional table fashions competition.

Forget Me Not Flower Shop provided flowers for the economic summit as well as for many royal visits. There have also been times when Rea was asked to come up with something different, such as the party where he lined a window of a restaurant with neon pink legs, each with ginger shooting from them.

Lately he is using a lot of wrought iron, especially in candelabras. When he does use candles, he explains he "likes to use an oil candle so it doesn't drip, and stays the same length throughout the evening." He once created a centrepiece by floating a lily in bowl with a candle underneath; it lit up the whole table. He generally only likes to work with silk flowers when he can make them look like the real thing.

He explains, for example, "We can use everything that was for the [wedding] ceremony for the reception afterwards." The arrangements are changed around so that they look new and different. A garden wedding theme can be carried through from the chupah, down the aisle, throughout the sanctuary and into the foyer.

Every party can use a little elegance. Floral Elegance (745-7045) is a flower shop that truly delivers, in more ways than one! Flowers are second nature to designer Esther Mauro.

Her family has been in the business for 20 years, first with Ital Florist and now expanding into their bridal division, Floral Elegance. Mauro is the coordinator and consultant. There is no charge for consultations. She meets with brides to discuss their initial needs and wants. As she explains, everything is "very, very tailored to the bride — luxurious and private. We can sit down and talk about their day."

As well as flowers, she can arrange to get extra props needed for the day, such as chair covers, balloons or any particular linens. Her shop is fully equipped to provide invitations and favors. Mauro recalled one wedding which was totally done in silver and gold. The centrepieces were six-foot silver trees, topped with a burst of silk apple blossoms. They have been rated amongst the top 10 florists in Canada by Teleflora Canada, based on delivery service and quality of their product. The quality of their service is impeccable.

Mauro says that the most popular styles of bouquet of late are cascades and posies. They can be made up of roses, orchids, orange blossoms or different types of lilies. Weddings are classic, natural and have an unstructured look. "People don't want their flowers to look like they've been worked with, they want them to look like they were just picked from the garden. Victorian styles are in right now."

The words English garden conjure up immediate images of tea and crumpets on a porch in a setting with violets, roses, and daisies. Covent Gardens Flower Market (960-5800) can create equally beautiful and fresh images, reminiscent of its namesake.

Owners Jane Bossin and Cheryl Glassman work together to create the desired effect. "If someone has a specific idea in mind, we would work around that, bring in props," says Glassman.

When necessary they will work on settings and even tents for an outdoor event. "It becomes a very personalized thing," adds Glassman. Participants in the Art in Bloom exhibit at The Art Gallery of Ontario, their arrangements have an artistic touch.

Bossin, a former interior designer, can use her knowledge to decorate and create a chupah in different material, wrapped in greenery or flowers. They will move flowers from a ceremony to a reception when they're not in the same building.

Glassman believes that people are setting their priorities differently. They seem to be spending more money on the table and centrepiece, than the surrounding area where an arrangement may get lost in a big hall.

"Things are simpler and more elegant than they use to be."

The latest in kosher catering

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

Customized menus, personalized service, exquisite presenation and tasty food are yours when you leave your party up to any one of several Toronto area kosher caterers.

Jacobs Caterers (905-886-3832), in business for 40 years, caters simchahs at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Synagogue, Torath Emeth Synagogue as well as private parties over 25 people.

Owner Kalman Lowenthal knows that a caterer's job is not done until the last guest leaves, so someone is present at every party from beginning to end to coordinate such things as speeches, candlelighting ceremonies and musicians.

"Food is of the utmost importance, but being a caterer is much more than food. We have to make sure the entire simchah runs smoothly," says Lowenthal.

He says that hosts play a big part in planning their own menus and Jacobs is able to accommodate most requests.

"Our chefs, who have extensive North American and European experience, can prepare anything from brisket and roast chicken to chicken Kiev or prime rib with peppercorn sauce. Low fat and cholesterol, salt restricted or vegetarian meals are always available, and a salad bar, elegantly displayed with vegetables and dressings can be part of a buffet or sit-down meal."

Peter Graben Caterers (416-510-1818) caters parties at several Toronto locations including Beth Tikvah and Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogues, as well as Casa Loma, Vaughan Estates and the Royal Ontario Museum and Planetarium. Meals for a private party are brought in and heated in the home.

"When you hire us, our staff takes care of everything from working with rental companies to arranging for cutlery, tables and chairs to bringing in serving staff if desired." says representative Lisa Wagman.

She says that Peter Graben is keeping up with the trend towards lower fat meals and knows that customers want a more exciting, updated menu.

"We still serve a lot of red meat, but chicken or fish such as grilled salmon or halibut have become popular choices," she says. "Our new dessert table is more oriented towards fruit, and features such items as fruit pastry with fresh fruit topping and pareve ice cream."

Wagman says that they can accommodate any size party from two to 1,000 people and they work closely with customers to help draw up a menu that will please them as well as make their party just a little different.

"Customers play an important role in choosing the menu, from giving requests to taking taste tests."

Rachel's Catering (416-633-6661), in business for over 25 years, caters at Pride of Israel Synagogue, as well as house parties and banquet halls such as Paradise, the Terrace or Baycrest Centre.

Owners, Rachel and Joe Halawani offer something exciting to those getting married at Pride of Israel. After every 25 couples have had their weddings, they are invited to participate in a draw. One of the couples will get a refund on the cost of their wedding, excluding taxes, of up to $10,000.

Rachel's menus are exciting, with a variety of cuisines including Oriental, Middle Eastern, Moroccan, Israeli, East European and French, and all menus can be customized. Specialties include Mediterranean salads such as spicy Turkish salad and babaganoush.

The client is number one at Rachel's and when a party site is chosen, they are there to make sure everything is in place and that the client has no worries.

Baycrest renovates

Baycrest Hospitality Services is offering an elegant new look.

The facilities of the kosher service, which accommodates and caters for groups of 10 to 500 people, recently underwent a complete redecoration.

"We've renovated all our rooms so that we can offer the perfect setting for any event, from personal celebrations like bar mitzvahs and weddings to professional conferences and seminars," says manager Sharon Bizouati.

Launched in April 1993, Baycrest Hospitality Services offers quality catering in a variety of surroundings, from the cozy intimacy of the Fireside Lounge with its walkout patio onto beautifully landscaped grounds, to the sophisticated atmosphere of the main dining room. Bizouati and the staff bring to the job more than 20 years of experience in serving the catering needs of the Jewish community and are pleased with the added service the renovations provide.

"In our main hall, we've created the warm, intimate look of a dining room in an elegant home, with soft pastels, sheers on windows, chandeliers and tasteful artwork," she says. "A new, sophisticated system provides a full range of lighting, from very bright illumination to soft candlelight and can be focussed on a specific area such as a head table. Our recently installed sound system, along with acoustical coverings for walls and hard floor surfaces, provide improved audio capabilities."

CREATIVE CENTREPIECES

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Centrepiece designers work with a variety of materials, including balloons, silk flowers and fresh flowers, but the most important ingredient that goes into an eye-catching centrepiece is creativity.

Imagination is the only limit when it comes to making centrepieces and balloon sculptures, a resource Richard Winkler and his sister-in-law Marsha Winkler of Happy Days (416-789-4438) have plenty of.

"We'll do any theme, and we've never been stumped in coming up with a theme for people," said Richard.

Balloon decor is an inexpensive way to create a fun atmosphere at parties of all kinds, including birthday parties and bar or bat mitzvahs. The Winklers produce made-to-order balloon sculptures on request — almost anything the customer wants — along with their ever-popular arches, clouds and trees for the hall, synagogue or party room.

The Winklers will incorporate party themes, such as sports, drama, dance, art, Star Trek and magic, into the room decorations, the centrepieces, the head table's name board and the sign-in board. As an extra touch, the boards are surrounded with twinkling lights.

Clients are invited to view their ready-made creations at the Happy Days studio.

Happy Days' newest centrepiece, a "smashable" kosher chocolate cake decorated with party themes, is sure to be a success at bar mitzvahs. Children smash the cake with the accompanying wooden mallett and eat the pieces.

Available at The Silk Plant Lady

For weddings, the Winklers make elegant centrepieces at reasonable prices. A favorite is floating candles. They decorate the head table with bows, ribbons and mylar, a type of shiny paper, and create romantic balloon arches with lights and bridal netting.

The Silk Plant Lady, Adriana Haberman (905-731-9894), is a centrepiece designer with an artist's perspective. A former student of New York's Parsons School of Design, she focuses on glamor and color coordination with the aim of producing a dazzling effect.

Haberman uses silk flowers in her centrepieces, which allows her to match the colors to the wedding colors. Exact matches, she said, cannot be made with natural flowers, but for the head table she recommends a combination of naturals and silks.

She said silks can almost duplicate nature. "When you look at something I made, you have to look at it three times to see if it is real or not."

For clients who want something different, she will fashion an art deco centrepiece out of black, while, silver, gold- and bronze-colored silk flowers. Or she can add candies or papier-mache swans to match a party theme.

Since guests and party givers take the centrepieces home, the silks will remind them of the party long after it is over.

Haberman is also available to drape synagogue aisles with chiffon and decorate the hall. "When the lights go on and people come into a room, it should take their breath away," Haberman said.

Depending on the client's budget. Haberman can enhance any hall with decorated chairs, ice sculptures or interior waterfalls. She said she has created a Hawaiian theme with silk trees, a night-club and a tropical garden for past clients. "You literally can create dreams and make them come true. My satisfaction is hearing gasps of admiration from the wedding party and crowd."

The Silk Plant Lady is available for parties, bar and bat mitzvahs, as well as weddings.

Evelyn Baker of Evelyn Baker Floral Design (416-469-1089) applies her artistic skills — she has a graphic arts and animation background — to producing centrepieces made of fresh flowers.

Custom-made centrepieces can range from plants in wicker baskets to extravagant arrangements. She adds ribbons to the pieces, but does not use props unless clients request them. "I like to have the flowers speak for themselves," she said.

The container, she stressed, is an important part of the centrepiece. Baker has used silver chalices and filled them with flowers that drape over the edges. "That's a really nice look," she said. For less costly centrepieces, Baker suggest roses bowls decorated with greenery, moss and baby's breath.

The flower industry, she noted, has responded to today's preference for garden and wildflowers by producing domesticated crops of flowers such as Queen Anne's lace. "Garden flowers are filled with bugs and they are not necessary bred for longevity."

Centrepieces raised on columns are in demand, she said, so as not to block the guests' view. Flower colors currently popular with her clientele include mauves, purples and pinks.

A miniature garden of tulips, daffodils, crocuses and irises in a terra-cotta pot or a wicker basket, she said, make ideal centrepieces for spring bar and bat mitzvahs.

As well as working with fresh flowers, she produces centrepieces made of dried flowers and topiaries — miniature trees adorned with flowers.

Baker provides a full decorating service and will work with a client's ideas or from a picture. She usually sticks to flowers, she said, along with fabrics and ribbon, when she decorates a hall.

Baker is available for weddings, at which she will decorate the chupah on request, bar and bat mitzvahs , and parties.

TUXEDO Trends

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Freeman Formal Wear (416-288-1919) has the distinction of being the only North American company that imports genuine top hats from England.

Since 1918 Freeman's has been supplying formal wear, either for purchase or rental, through menswear and bridal shops across Canada.

"There is hardly a city or town that doesn't have a representative," and Freeman's Len Goldstein. Locally, Freeman Formal Wear can be found at five showrooms in Metropolitan Toronto and surrounding areas.

Freeman features comfortable and roomy European fit tuxedos. The tuxedos are made of lightweight 100 per cent wool or a combination of wool and mohair.

"These fabrics are not normally used for rental suits," said Goldstein. "You feel wonderful when you're wearing them, which helps you enjoy yourself at the event."

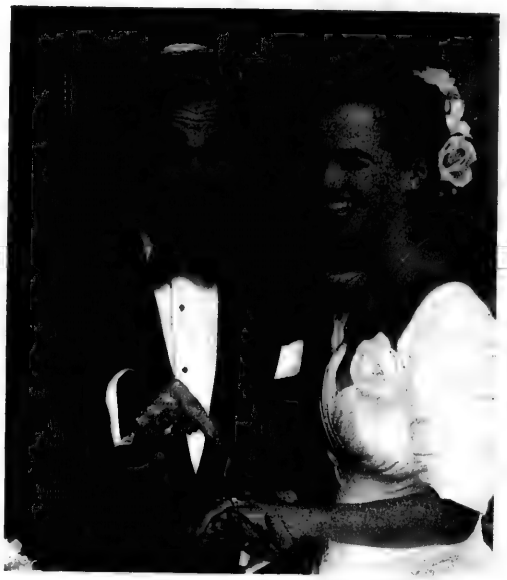
Whether single- or double-breasted, Freeman's tuxedos come in a variety of lapel styles. Along with black, gray and white tuxedos, they offer one in dark green, which Goldstein says has a place at weddings, where it matches colors worn by the wedding party.

Freeman's carries formal wear ranging from boys' size 2 to men's size 64, and every size in between, including odd sizes like 41 and 43.

All rental suits are custom-tailored for any build, including the athletic physique. Last minute alterations can be done overnight or sooner.

Colorful vests, Goldstein reported, are growing in popularity. Freeman's has a large selection of vests, which can be rented at no extra charge along with jackets. Trousers, ties, cummberbunds and formal shirts are available free of charge as part of the jacket rental package. Extras include top hats, walking sticks, opera capes and shoes by Dacks. Hose and silk pocket squares can be purchased from Freeman's.

The Glenguard suit, designed for Moore The Suit People (905-731-0160), is the best suit in Canada and second internationally, according to judges of the recently 165th International Designer Award Show held in Montreal.



Tuxedo available at Freeman Formalwear outlets.

Garments submitted to the jury by designers from 15 countries were unlabeled to eunsure impartiality, said Ron Prosserman of Moores.

Prosserman recommends the Glenguard for the father of the bride or groom. "The Glenguard sets a new standard of Canadian tailoring excellence. The finest European faric assures a look and feel of true elegance."

For ushers Moores features Oscar de la Renta suits, available in Canada exclusively at Moores.

The Moores tuxedo in classic black is trimmed with satin lapels and buttons. Available in sizes 36 to 48 regular — short, tall or portly — and oversize, the Moores tuxedo is for purchase only. "Why rent when you can own your own new tuxedo?" said Prosserman.

All Moores suits are made of European fabrics. Interfaces in the garments are canvas instead of cotton/linen blends, in accordance with shaatnas, the Jewish law that states the two fabrics should not be combined.

Tuxedo accessories available from Moores include shirts, ties, suspenders and cummerbunds.

Tailors on the premises of Moores stores across Canada, including Metropolitan Toronto, make alterations and pant hemming can be done while you wait.

Sal Caira of Syd Silver Formals (416-256-4784) says, contrary to what many people think, tuxedo styles do change. "We always introduce what's latest in style," he said.

The tuxedos, including European-cut styles, are designed for Syd Silver. Made of premium Italian wool, they start at boy's size 2 and go up to men's size 60. For rent or purchase, their single- and double-breasted tuxedos come in a variety of lapel styles.

Caira finds black is still the most popular color, but he says more men than ever are buying white. Tuxedos are available in navy, gray and ivory, too. Alterations are done by Syd Silver's tailors.

Accessories like vests, suspenders, shirts, cummerbunds and cufflinks are included in the rental price.

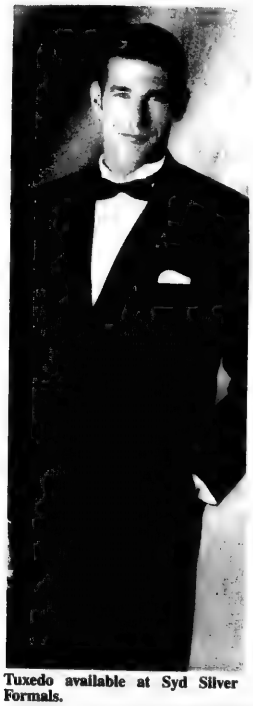
Although double-breasted vests are still popular today, Caira said many men are opting for single-breasted multi-colored vests, which they sometimes wear with matching cummerbunds. The latest trend is to match vests and cummerbunds with the bridal party dresses, according to Caira.

This year Syd Silver introduced formal footwear made of 100 per cent textured wool faille with a matte finish. Caira said the shoes are more comfortable than traditional formal footwear made of patent leather.

Most grooms rent cufflinks because they want their jewelry to match with the jewelry worn by the ushers, he pointed out, but Syd Silver does offer better jewelry for the grooms who wish to purchase.

Pocket squares and fine-textured formal hosiery, which matches the various tuxedo colors exactly, are for sale.

Syd Silver tuxedos are available through menswear and bridal shops across Canada and at a half-dozen Syd Silver locations in and around Metropolitan Toronto.



Tuxedo available at Syd Silver Formals.

Tuxedo available at Moores The Suit People Inc.

PARTY'S HERE !

From JAZZ to POP to

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

"I could have danced all night — I could have danced all night," and dance we did! Because we were at a simchah with one fantastic band.

There are some vibrant and entertaining bands available today and the choices of what they offer has never been better.

Kenny Simon and the Hourglass Orchestra (638-2549) have 25 years of experience performing at weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs and anniversary parties.

They have played with major bands such as Manhattan Transfer, The Nylons and Juno Award-winner Michelle Wright.

Their repertoire includes everything from show tunes, rock, ballads, Jewish standards, contemporary rock, big band, swing and '60s rock. They can also provide music for wedding ceremonies, typically flute and piano. Simon wears many hats, in addition to being bandleader, he plays bass guitar, keyboards and provides backup vocals.

This is a band that's played for royalty, namely Prince Philip, at the Duke of Edinburgh awards for Canada.

A sound man regulates the music throughout the night, so the volume can be altered to suit the crowd. Simon's current vocalists and instrumentalists "have played with the best of the best in the world. Our singers are choreographed, they move around so it's almost like a show band."

If requested, the band will do floor shows.

Simon explains that sometimes, "the newlyweds may not want to be upstaged by the band — so the band may have to hold back. When they need music, the music is there." He gears the music to the group. "I'm very interested in keeping the people, whatever their ages, on the dance floor." A lot of songs they play will cover different age groups, such as Unchained Melody. "I try to play songs that everyone can get into."

Reflections (256-1801) is a band that can only reflect well on you.

Who is Reflections?

It's three vibrant singers and dancers, Aubrey Mann, George St. Kitts and Eddie Staxx, who joined forces in 1987 to create some electric sounds.

The three have at least 60 years of musical experience amongst them. They perform backed up by a full band, and create great vibes in pop, rock, jazz, and their specialty — rhythm and blues.

Spokeswoman Cassie Usher notes, "they provide incredible dancing music as well as a show for those who don't like to dance."

All three of the singers are solo artists, known across the country, and when they come together, it's explosive. They have 2-3,000 copies of music in their repertoire, including James Brown, Earth, Wind and Fire, Smokey Robinson, Luther Vandross, Michael Bolton and more.

They have performed at the Canadian Video Awards two years in a row and were nominated in 1989 at the Toronto Music Awards in the category of Best Toronto R & B/Soul/Rap Group/Artist.

Mann explains that their philosophy of performing is to play softly during the dinner hour, then after the speeches, and dinner has had a chance to settle, "we come and hit you hard in your backyard.

"The audience is the most important thing, we go and dance with the audience." This talented group can do requests on the spot without difficulty. They will also learn something specially requested ahead of time, such as a unique wedding song.

Murray Alter (223-1427 or 782-3931) knows the music business. As a bandleader, he definitely knows how to please a crowd.

Through many weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs as well as corporate functions, he has always sensed the pulse of the crowd. He's known when to speed up the tempo, when to play more softly, when to jazz down and when to boogie it up. Now he's sensing the pulse of the consumer. He has realized that there is a need in these sometimes tough times for a scaled down alternative in live music at a simchah.

Mila Kanev of the Mila Kanev Band.

Murray Alter's Talent Associates Ltd. has several sizes, styles and price tags of groups to meet the public's needs. His experience enables him to make suggestions, that might not have otherwise been thought of. He has affordably priced combos that can fill a client's needs, from duos, trios and up. The Sky's the Limit, is one of his newer bands. It can meet all styles and ethnic demands, playing everything from Latin American to contemporary to Middle Eastern to Hispanic music. This band can deliver hot sounds, sure to put sizzle into any party.

The Mila Kanev Band (416) 665-2450) can add fun, sparkle and energy to any simchah. These are the qualities that best describe lead singer, Kanev. Her personality and singing talent combine to warm up most any crowd.

Kanev, who moved originally to Winnipeg from Kiev 15 years ago, is very happy to be able to perform at Jewish functions. She remembers in Kiev when singing in Hebrew and Yiddish was prohibited.

"The first thing I did when I came to Winnipeg was learn Yiddish and Hebrew songs."

The band can appeal to diverse musical tastes within the community.

Kanev sings in 15 different languages. She is also an actress and has appeared in feature film as well as on television, radio, stage and in clubs. This added talent enables her to bring out the spirit in the crowd. She gets them singing and clapping with her, providing them with tambourines and maracas, to create an instant secondary percussion section.

"Especially at a bar mitzvah, the kids really love to participate," adds Kanev.

in ✡ T.O. MESSAGE FROM THE CHAIRMEN

Welcome to another issue of inT.O. As we write this article, we welcome the festival of Shavuot, marking the giving of the Torah, a new era for the Jewish people. It is a time of new beginnings, both for the Jewish community as a whole, and for ourselves, as we embark on our new appointment as co-chairs of the Young Leadership Network (YLN).

For those of you who are new to UJA, YLN is the umbrella network of four divisions composed of people aged 22-40. YLN is committed to providing a forum of communication, leadership training, education and volunteer opportunities in the UJA campaign.

As always, this year promises to be interesting, rewarding and fun for YLN. Just a few examples of the calibre of our programming are a comedy and improvisational night, inspiring and topical speakers and an upcoming mission to the Czech Republic and Israel in July.

We invite you to get involved and "czech" us out and hope to see you at one of our future programs.

BUSINESS SOARS FOR SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE DURING ECONOMIC DOWNTURN

The recession has been good to Antony Karabus.

The former chairman of UJA's Young Business Network is a profit improvement specialist. Not surprisingly, since 1991 when Canadians were severely suffering the recession's sting, business has been, as Karabus puts it, "dead solid."

From a one man operation in 1989, Karabus Consulting Inc. now employs 7 people to handle its influential clientele. That's quite a personal profit improvement for someone who arrived here from South Africa only 7 years ago.

In Cape Town, Karabus worked for Arthur Andersen & Co., a global accounting giant, but political insecurity forced him out of South Africa. Karabus knew he didn't want to live in the United States, yet he wanted to be within reach of American business centres. So Canada was a natural choice, and Arthur Andersen was ready to transfer him.

The transition wasn't exactly simple, but it wasn't wrenching either. And United Jewish Appeal, he remembers, made the move much easier by being "unbelievably welcoming."

For two years, Karabus was the captain of Arthur Andersen's profit improvement division in Toronto before leaving life as an employee in corporate Canada behind.

"I don't really like and respond well to bureaucratic rules," he admits.

The first year of independent business was probably a bigger upheaval than leaving South Africa. "We did only $6,000 in billings in the first five months," he recalls. Then, one of his friends bought a stock brokerage firm, hired Karabus to examine the operation, and Karabus Consulting began its own upward business cycle.

For recession-weary companies, there's a lot that Karabus can do.

"We help them come up with their own ways of increasing profits and cash flow," he says. "We go through every single step in the revenue and expenditure process and we emerge with the best possible method in the shortest amount of time with the fewest number of people."

Karabus believes many managers spend too much time "authorizing and reviewing, and too little time strategizing." He also thinks companies rely too heavily on across the board cost cutting, instead of making more selective judgements. But dealing with costs and concepts on paper is only part of the story. Even the most innovative profit improvement solutions won't work, warns Karabus, without support and involvement from front-line employees most affected by changes. That's why he draws them into the process.

Karabus loves to tell the story of one male worker with a "suit, tie pin and pony tail," who, in the course of a project, got the chance to make a detailed presentation to the boss about what was wrong and what should be done.

"He's happy as hell," Karabus enthusiastically relates, "and he's guaranteed a promotion."

It takes just seconds for a listener to realize that Karabus really loves what he does and excels at self-confidence. How else could you assess someone who insists that "once we get a customer, we never leave?"

When Karabus is not concentrating on his company, he devotes his time to UJA, which has helped him connect with his Jewish roots. His involvement originated in South Africa, but Karabus is more attached to the future of UJA and the role he intends to play.

"It is," he proclaims, "an incredible organization." ✡

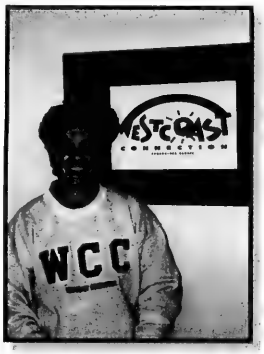
A WEST COAST CONNECTION WITH AN EAST COAST FLAVOUR

Fran Grundman thought life was going pretty well 8 years ago, when an old friend from Camp Kennebec called to ask whether she was interested in getting involved with Westcoast Connection, a travel camp he had been running for the previous three years. Fran was always open to new ideas and told her friend, Stan Browman, to make her an offer. He did, and she promptly rejected it. Luckily, he came back with another offer, this time to make Fran a 50% partner in the company, and this time she accepted.

Together the two, who have known each other since they were ten years old, have grown the fledgling Montreal-based travel camp company to a camping powerhouse which ranks #1 in the category in Canada, and #3 in the competitive North American market. Now in its twelfth year, Westcoast Connection generates $2 million in sales from sixteen bus, outdoor and bike tours, and operates from offices in Toronto, New York, and Irvine, California, as well as Montreal.



Fran Grundman, co-owner of Westcoast Connection Travel Camp.

What has made Westcoast so successful? Fran thinks it is because she and Stan really put a lot of thought into what would make the best possible trip. They do extensive research; they train their staff thoroughly; they interview every single camper personally; and they know exactly where every trip is at every moment. Fran says that when you run all of the tours together from start to finish, the season lasts only 45 days. You don't have a lot of time to get everything right and, more importantly she says, you have to know your limitations. "You promise these kids and their parents a lot and you have to make the promises come true."

The other reason for Westcoast's success, in Fran's opinion, is the incestuous nature of the people involved. The "connection" in Westcoast Connection may very well refer to the aforementioned long-term friendship between Fran and Stan (so close that some campers can't seem to understand that they aren't married, despite the fact that they live in different cities.) Or it may also refer to the fact that of the five key people involved, four have known each other since Kennebec days, and two (Fran and Lori) are sisters.

How is it working with all of these old friends? "Great!" says Fran. "When you start a business, you look for people you know and trust to be involved." The only ones who aren't officially involved are Fran's husband, Doug, and their children. Even though Fran works out of her basement home office, Doug's main contribution is his generous support of a business which tends to take over the whole house and family. Her two daughters, Jody (5) and Ali (3), contribute by staying out of the office when Mom is working.

Fran thinks one of the most interesting things she has learned from being involved with Westcoast Connection is that kids are the same, no matter where they come from. The camp now draws teenagers from England, France, and Colombia, among other places, and "when they walk in the door, they're the same, they look the same, they listen to the same music, they dress the same…kids from Columbia, wearing lumberjack shirts tied around their waists!"

Not only are all kids similar in dress and manner, but in other ways too. They don't like to be bored (Westcoast keeps their trips action-packed), they like to be exposed to new things but still stay socially within a safe and familiar group, and finally, almost uniformly, they don't know how to do their own laundry. Well, on a Westcoast trip, they learn how to do laundry and a few other things too…like how to cook and clean up after themselves, manage money and be responsible.

The kids get exposure to responsibility in other ways as well. While Fran supports UJA and the Jewish community, she and Stan felt the camp should be affiliated with an organization kids would more readily identify with. To give something back to the community, Westcoast Connection attached itself to the Starlight Foundation, a charity involved with children.

Fran Grundman has helped to create Westcoast Connection, an east coast company with a heart. After talking to Fran for about five minutes, you'll think that Westcoast Connection is worth getting in T.O.! ✸

HELPING ENSURE JEWISH CONTINUITY A STRESSFUL TASK

In the world of communal service, a veteran leader like Aaron Brotman is not easily worn down. But Brotman's current assignment has, at times, come close to pushing him over the edge.

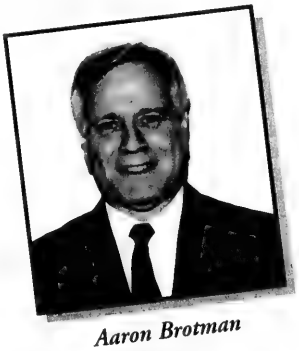
Brotman chairs the Task Force on Jewish Continuity, Assimilation and Intermarriage, also known by its shorter title: the 'Continuity Task Force.' It was formed by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"This is, far and away, without exaggeration, the most difficult issue I've dealt with," Brotman confesses.

According to a Federation study, intermarriage in Toronto has increased tenfold from 3% to 30% over the past 30 years. The American experience shows intermarriage rates rising with each successive generation.

So, faced with what Brotman calls "a time of crisis and emergency," the task force, (originally 16 members and now 13) set out to discover the roots of assimilation and intermarriage.

Exhaustive consultations were held with over 40 organizations, rabbis and individuals. Focus groups were conducted and think tanks assembled. Consensus, says Brotman, was hard to find.



Aaron Brotman

"Everybody would say 'I'd like my children to marry Jewish,' but some people feel they can live with it if they don't."

Brotman admits there were no positions common to everyone consulted, although there was little animosity among those with opposing viewpoints.

The nearest common denominator was Israel, to which just about everyone professed loyalty. However, Brotman cautions that attitudes are changing. Despite the broad bridges separating philosophies about continuity, Brotman is determined to write a report with substance - even controversy.

"Some people are not going to like the things we say," he cautions.

The task force targeted its recommendations to different stages in the Jewish life cycle. These suggestions cover educational, cultural and social subjects. Most importantly, they will require community commitment.

"What we're recommending will cost money," he warns, "and we're going to have to find the money."

Brotman believes the ultimate success of the task force will not be measured in months or years, but in decades.

"We may not know in my lifetime how successful we were." ✸

EVENT REPORTS

CANADIANS SPOTTED ON CAPITOL HILL

Fifteen members of Toronto's Jewish community recently took part in UJA's Ninth National Young Leadership Conference in Washington, D.C.

'Washington 9', held from March 19th to 22nd, focused on the theme of "Challenges to a New Generation." The Conference started with a visit to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum and ended with meeting eight politicians on Capitol Hill. In between was a non-stop emotional and intellectual challenge for all 2,600 attendees that included plenaries on topics ranging from African-American/Jewish relations, to "Shaping a Pro-Israel Communications Strategy", to "Instilling Jewish Values in Family Life."

While the formal aspect was inspiring, the networking opportunities proved just as enriching. Knowing that you were connecting with people who share your values and commitment, and with whom you could be forging life-long friendships, made the three days an incredibly invigorating experience. ✡

YOUNG LEADERSHIP NETWORK VOLUNTEERS PERFORM PASSOVER MITZVAH ONCE AGAIN

The Young Leadership Network (YLN), in an effort to involve its members in direct service activities, conducted its second annual "Mitzvah Program" in March.

Over 30 UJA volunteers spent a Sunday afternoon packing Pesach boxes for the Jewish poor in Toronto. The annual food drive is sponsored by the National Council of Jewish Women and Jewish Family and Child Service.

YLN believes that it is important for fund raisers to "get their hands dirty" periodically and learn how important and satisfying an experience direct service can be. The participants agreed unanimously that this activity was really worth getting inT.O.!! ✡

GOING PUBLIC WITH LAWRENCE BLOOMBERG

On Thursday, March 17, Lawrence Bloomberg, President, Chief Executive Officer and Director of First Marathon Inc. and Co-Chairperson of the 1994 UJA Campaign, spoke to the Young Business Network (YBN). The event, held at the Toronto Stock Exchange, was very successful.

Speaking of his journey to the top, Lawrence captivated the audience of approximately 100 business people. He spoke of growing up in a middle class family in Montreal and always aspiring for more. After receiving an MBA, Lawrence started working with Nesbitt Thomson 29 years ago. He was appointed Head of Research and subsequently Vice-President and Director of Institutional Equity Sales, before joining Pitfield Mackay Ross in a similar position in 1975. He was one of the founders of First Marathon Securities in 1979 (a name the founders attribute to their love for running).

From the time he spent speaking to the YBN group, one could clearly see that Lawrence is dedicated to everything he does. Besides being President of First Marathon Inc. and Co-Chairperson of the 1994 UJA Campaign, Lawrence is a dedicated family person and an avid runner and golfer.

His commitment to UJA has been fabulous! Despite a troubled economy, he and Co-Chairman Lawrence Fein have spearheaded the 1994 UJA campaign to record results. For the first time, they approached corporations for the campaign this year, and met with resounding success.

Lawrence is an inspiration to us all! ✡

Jews' contribution to war effort recognized

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Grey skies and showers did not dampen the sentiment at a ceremony last week at the National War Memorial in Ottawa to honor the Jewish war veterans in Canada.

More than 300 Jewish veterans, including a dozen men and women who served with the Russian army but now live in Toronto, came to the tribute organized by the Canadian Jewish Congress as part of its 75th anniversary activities. They were saluted by city councillors, members of parliament, ambassadors and military attaches from Allied countries that fought during World War II, members of the Canadian military and a Canadian Armed Forces band.

Although 16,000 Canadian Jews served with the Armed Forces during World War II, this was the first time their contribution to the war effort was recognized.

"A lot of people did not know there were Jewish people in the war and it's time that they found out", said Louis Wiseman of the Montreal Post of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada. "When we parade in Quebec, they are amazed to see the star of David [on our hats]."

The tribute was held a week before the worldwide commemoration of the 50th anniversary of D-Day, June 6, when Allied troops landed in Normandy and began what was ultimately the Nazi defeat. As they advanced, the soldiers discovered and liberated the concentration camps.

"Fifty years ago, " said Irving Abella, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, at the ceremony, "as the Allies began liberating the concentration camps, the world learned that events too horrible to be believed were not too horrible to have happened. The world, we learned, had failed the test of civilization. That must never happen again."

The best way to memorialize the Jewish soldiers who fought and died for Canada, added Abella, is to combat bigotry.

"The legacy of these magnificent men and women who took up arms to defend our democracy must be to stiffen our resolve and determination to advance the human rights of all Canadians, no matter their race, their color or their creed," he said.

Before leading the gathering in a prayer for lost soldiers, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Machzikei Hadas Congregation in Ottawa, who was born on D-Day, reminded the crowd that according to Jewish teachings, saving the life of a single person is like saving the entire world.

"What then shall we say about those who have indeed saved an entire world ... They are heroes of freedom, heroes of humanity, heroes of Canada," said Rabbi Bulka.

Sam Pasternak, National Commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, praised the heroism of the veterans, but also lamented the separatist movement in Quebec.

"During the Second World War and the hell that was war, we Canadians stood as a united people. From the west, through Ontario, through Quebec, through the Maritimes, through Newfoundland, we fought, we bled, yes, and died together. What kind of madness is this that sweeps our nation today that we would talk of division?"

But like the rest of the veterans, Pasternak said he felt honored by the ceremony.

"To hear Kaddish and K'El Maleh Rachamim [prayers for the dead], never mind at the national war memorial, it was really something," he said.

Legion says no to kippot, turbans

Jews, Sikhs condemn vote

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Airforce veteran Joe Blumer, 72, is furious that some say he can't wear a kippah in a Royal Canadian Legion canteen.

Montreal resident Blumer said his "blood boiled" when he learned Legion members voted overwhelmingly last Tuesday against a by-law allowing Sikhs, Jews and others to wear religious headgear in Legion branches.

Claiming that heads must be bared to show respect for fallen comrades, delegates to the biennial Legion convention in Calgary voted 1,959 to 629 against the by-law adopted by the Legion's national executive in November 1993. The 1,750 branches will now set their own policies.

For Blumer, president of the Brigadier Frederick Kisch branch in Cote St. Luc, that policy will be simple. The 187 branch members, 184 of whom are Jewish, will now wear kippot to monthly meetings with the 14 area Legion branches.

"Anyone who comes to our meetings and doesn't like what they see — the door's open for them to leave," Blumer told The CJN. "And if they don't accept us, we'll walk out."

Legion spokesman Gilles Bussieres said the Legion's governing body was disappointed by the Calgary vote, but the decision will stand. "The will of the members. . .becomes the policy of the Royal Canadian Legion." The Legion is a privately-funded organization with 525,000 members.

That policy is unusual among veterans' organizations. A spokesman for the American Legion, with 3.1 million members, told The CJN there are "no prohibitions" on religious headgear.

The 750,000-strong Royal British Legion deems Sikh turbans and other religious headgear "completely acceptable," said spokesman Jeremy Lillies from London. "As a matter of fact it is part of our uniform."

Canadian Jewish Congress and the World Sikh Organization have condemned the Calgary vote. The two organizations will meet this week to discuss "any and all political and legal options," confirmed Congress spokesman Steven Shulman.

"I'm really shocked," said World Sikh Organization executive director Anne Lowthian after the vote last week. The Ottawa-based organization represents half of Canada's 300,000 Sikhs, many of whom served in the British and Indian armies. "The whole mandate of the Legion is to support comradeship."

Comradeship is something Pritam Singh Jawhal will miss in the coming months. Jawhal, 73, fought for three years with the famed British Eighth Army in North Africa during World War II. But he won't enter a Legion branch to share war stories until the by-law allowing turbans and kippot is reinstated.

"If they change their minds, I'm prepared to go running, on foot, to join them," Jawhal said from his Surrey, B.C., home.

Like Jawhal, Sam Pasternak would like the situation resolved within the community of veterans. Pasternak, the president of the 2,000-member Jewish War Veterans of Canada, said he hopes Legion members "see the error of their ways and say 'It was a mistake.'

"What do they have to gain by aggravating a dying population," asked Pasternak, 69, who joined the Royal Canadian Air Force in 1943.

But Pasternak and others were further hurt by revelations last week that cowboy hats will be welcomed in certain Alberta Legion halls during the Calgary Stampede next month.

B'nai Brith Canada at first was careful to characterize the legion vote as simple ignorance, but "the 10-gallon hat issue has exposed the real issue," said executive vice-president Frank Dimant. "It smacks of racism, it smacks of tremendous bigotry and it smacks of anti-Semitism."

Rare Syrian Torah on display

Stunning in simplicity

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A remnant of a once-great Jewish community is often a sad thing to behold, but the last Torah of Aleppo, Syria is worth a trip to Beth Tzedec Congregation, where it's currently on display.

The Torah, penned in rich, black letters in the block-like Sephardi style and written not on parchment but on soft, supple leather — possibly deerskin — is a reminder of a community, dating back to the eighth century, that flourished under several different rules.

But the Torah, said to be between 200 and 300 years old and stunning in its simplicity, also tells the tale of modern Syria, which has been a brutal prison for Jews. For decades, Syrian Jews were mercilessly oppressed but could not leave the country. Ironically, it is still strictly forbidden to take Jewish religious artifacts out; any transgressor receives an automatic 15-year jail term. So the mere presence of this Torah at Beth Tzedec speaks volumes about courage and determination.

All that can be told is that someone in Aleppo, in northern Syria, wanted to thank the Beth Tzedec-based Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands, which since 1973 has collected funds and supplies for Syria's beleaguered Jews.

So the Torah, said to have been the last in Aleppo's dwindling community, was smuggled out in February inside a suitcase — at great personal risk to its carrier — and given as a gift to Judy Feld Carr, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's National Task Force for Syrian Jews.

Its ornate silver case had to be left behind.

The Torah will be exhibited at Beth Tzedec's Ruben and Helene Dennis Museum until summer's end, when it will find a circuitous way back to its erstwhile owners: Carr plans to donate it to a synagogue founded by former Aleppo Jews in the Katamon district of Jerusalem.

Ever since Syrian President Hafez al-Assad relaxed travel for Syrian Jews in 1992, most of the country's Jews have come out. Today, there are fewer than 700 left, with no more than a few dozen in Aleppo.

Aleppo was once home to some 10,000 Jews but a 1947 anti-Jewish riot destroyed synagogues and heralded a long reign of terror.

A Hebrew inscription on the back of the Torah notes that it was acquired in 1814 "for the worship of my Creator."

Carr says the Torah will undergo testing in Israel to determine its precise age and origin.

Toronto rabbis divided over same-sex bill

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Except for the Orthodox, there seems to be little unanimity among Toronto's rabbis on the Ontario government's proposed bill to extend spousal benefits to same-sex families.

If passed in its current form, the controversial bill would alter the legal definition of spouse, allow same-sex couples to adopt children and offer gay and lesbian couples benefits now available only to heterosexual couples.

The legislation has unleashed a storm of protest, most notably perhaps, from the Roman Catholic Church.

A pastoral letter written late last month by Toronto Archbishop Aloysius Ambrozic urges Catholics to vigorously lobby their MPPs to kill the bill.

The bill passed first reading in the legislature and is now being debated in second reading. Many Ontario Liberals and Tories, as well as some members of the ruling New Democrats, say it goes too far.

But at least two Metro Reform rabbis have come out visibly in support of the bill.

Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton and Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld of Temple Emanu-El in Toronto appeared last Thursday at a Queen's Park news conference with other clergy to announce their support for the proposed legislation.

"As rabbis who believe that all human beings are created in the image of God and therefore possess an inherent dignity, and as members of a people that have suffered the most subtle and blatant forms of discrimination, we will continue to oppose discrimination based on race, religion and sexual orientation," a statement issued by Rabbis Zeplowitz and Bielfeld said.

Sephardi youth convention draws record numbers

Delegates come from around the world

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joy Matathias, 18, bounces off stage and collapses in a fit of giggles.

The Long Island, N.Y., teen has just finished telling the 325 Sephardi young adults gathered for the annual Sepharad convention about the five summer weeks she spent in Israel learning more about her Sephardi heritage.

Matathias, flushed with excitement, says the Israel trip reaffirmed her identity as a Greek Jew and inspired her to start a young people's social club at her synagogue.

"I like to be with Sephardi people," she said.

Matathias was not alone in her feelings. Sepharad '94, held here over the American Memorial Day weekend May 27 to 30, boasted the largest number of participants of its six-year history.

Conventioners aged 18 to 36 came from Columbia, England, Israel, Mexico, Turkey and Uruguay, as well as from the North American cities of Chicago, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Miami, Montreal, New York, Toronto and Washington, D.C.

Toronto had 60 conventioners, Montreal 50. The largest single contingent came from the New York area, 80 in all, while the smallest group was two from London, England.

They met for three days of socializing, with educational Shabbat programs led by Rabbis Benito Garzon of Madrid and Amram Assayag, Mordechai Becher and Yehiel Benayon of Toronto.

Rabbi Garzon is the director of the Sephardic Educational Centre (SEC), an international organization that seeks to foster love for Judaism, Israel and Sephardi traditions in young Sephardim. Sepharad '94 was sponsored by the Toronto chapter of the SEC.

Convention chair Helene Drobenare, 25, declared Sepharad '94 a success, with 75 per cent of conventioners attending one of the five Shabbat discussion groups. Nearly everyone was on hand for a post-havdalah party at the CN Tower, a Sunday tour of Toronto's Harbourfront and an evening gala at Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation.

First-time conventioner Robert Mardca, 35, a Long Island architect, was impressed by the turnout. "It's good to see there are so many Jewish people like us eager to know each other. I feel among friends."

Fellow Long Islanders Avi and Rami Noy were at their sixth Sepharad. The Noys, born in Israel to Iranian parents, said they like being with Jews of any background.

But Avi, 29, joked that with his dark skin and short stature he also fits into the New York Puerto Rican community. "I'm not afraid to go into the Bronx [where he develops real estate with his brother]. I look local."

On the school buses transporting conventioners around the city, one could hear Spanish, Hebrew, French and Farsi being spoken. Sephardim from Los Angeles mingled with their Toronto counterparts, and business cards were exchanged as frequently as the good-natured barbs.

Drobenare, an Ashkenazi Jew, explained what makes the SEC conventions so much fun for her.

"It's a great movement," said the New Yorker. "It's open, warm, welcoming . . . it's really a place for everybody."

Next year's Sepharad is tentatively scheduled for Buenos Aires.

Between conventions, the SEC offers trips to Israel for youth aged 14 to 25 in cooperation with the American Zionist Youth Foundation and Dor Hemshech.

The SEC was founded 15 years ago by Dr. Jose Nessim. Nessim greeted the conventioners Friday afternoon, along with Toronto convention chairs Debbie and Jeff Beine and New York convention chair Vivian Mahlab.

Mahlab also spoke Sunday morning at the community-sponsored breakfast at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living. She implored conventioners to maintain family traditions and unwittingly told them about her domestic skills.

"I think about all those wonderful Iraqi dished my mother prepares, and I can't," she said to thunderous laughter.

Sports, social programs urged as forums to draw young Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Advertising in the non-Jewish press, attracting young people through sports leagues, and offering programs that may not have a particularly Jewish content were some of the suggestions offered at a recent brainstorming session for broadening the appeal of the Jewish community to unaffiliated Jews.

Attracting people to events where they can socialize with other Jews could lead to further interest in community activities and serve to bring them closer into the Jewish fold, a number of speakers suggested.

The ideas were offered at the first meeting of the Canadian commission on Jewish identity and continuity, a forum held at a Toronto airport hotel under the auspices of the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada (CJF).

The forum attracted federation representatives from Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Ottawa and Calgary as well as rabbis from three streams of Judaism and spokespeople for Jewish students.

Concern over assimilation and intermarriage has prompted a number of communities to launch task forces to study the issue and report on methods of addressing the problem, said Sheldon Maerov, executive director of CJF. The CJF commission will co-ordinate their efforts.

The meeting was "meant to kick-start as many communities as possible," he said.

"Our role is to facilitate and stimulate, not solve the problems. That happens at the local level."

Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver have already begun to deal with the issue — the report of the Toronto task force is expected within weeks — and CJF is urging other communities to address the issue as well.

According to Stanley Plotnick, national chair of the CJF commission, intermarriage rates in Canada range from the continent-wide low of Montreal's seven per cent to Vancouver's 35.4 percent. Based on 1991 Canadian Census data, the Jewish intermarriage rate in Canada is 16.2 nationally. Toronto falls below the average, with 11.3 percent. Winnipeg is next at 15.9 percent, Ottawa has a rate of 22.8 percent, and Calgary has a rate of 30.2 percent.

Federation CJA has achieved success through its ProMontreal program, said CJA spokeswoman Penni Kolb, which tries to keep young people in the city by helping them find jobs. It also creates social situations, such as three parties that averaged 1,100 participants each. "When you put this many Jewish kids in one room, something Jewish will happen," she said.

Gerald Fisher, a spokesman on leadership development for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT), said the federation tries to attract the thousands of unaffiliated Jews in areas outside the heavily-populated Bathurst corridor and is urging the community's service-providing agencies to do the same.

The JFGT's human resources component can educate more people about the organized community and the services it offers, he said.

Fisher called for programs to help reach young people, inform them about the community infrastructure and what it may offer them.

Michael Frankel, treasurer of Federation CJA Montreal, suggested a variety of creative fundraising techniques to help finance the programs that may be adopted to attract Jewish people.

"Challenge" programs, where big donors match contributions from others, have proven successful, he said. Frankel suggested seeking out community foundations, government grants and families as new sources of revenue.

Rabbi Jeffrey Gale of Temple Shalom in Winnipeg said synagogues should reach out to those who feel "alienated from synagogue life" while Rabbi Reuben Poupko of the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue of Montreal said "we are now reaping the harvest of the universal ideas the Jewish community has championed."

These values have led to the acceptance of Jews in the wider community and hence to assimilation and intermarriage, he said.

In a brainstorming session, participants suggested programs that focus on contemporary issues like date rape and sexual abuse will attract people and serve as a lure to further programs.

Addressing family needs such as day care is another means of drawing unaffiliated into the community's net, another participant suggested.

Immigration quotas said bad for Quebec

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Although it is "understandable" for Quebec to try to attract as many francophone immigrants as possible to the province, it should not resort to quotas to do so, argues an eight-page brief to the Quebec government submitted by Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

The brief, submitted May 15 to the Ministry of International Affairs, Immigration and Cultural Communities (MCCI), which is now in a process of reassessing the province's immigration policy, focused on immigration levels for the years 1995 to 1997.

And according to the brief, that level should be brought back up to 45,000, the number Quebec fixed for 1993 before cutting it back to 40,000 in '94 because of a decline in the Quebec economy.

In the view of CJC-Q and JIAS, the province should be taking a long-term view.

"In view of the future demographic conditions we will probably face, we believe raised levels of immigration are essential," the brief says.

Earlier in the brief, CJC-Q and JIAS urged the ministry not to focus primarily on French-language skills as the basis for selecting independent immigrants.

While Quebec's desire to attract as many francophones as possible is understandable, the brief says, it should not do so by imposing quotas on the number of non-francophones who can immigrate.

"It would be unjust," the brief states, "to use this as the sole basis for accepting or refusing applicants. Language remains an important element, but it is not the most important aspect of the integration process."

What is more relevant, the brief suggests, is the immigrant's commitment to adapting to Quebec's "new reality," not linguistic or cultural origins.

More generally, the brief puts forward that immigration remains an "essential" part of preserving the province's "vitality" and, as the MCCI itself indicated last February, a response to the province's demographic decline.

Although Quebec wields more control over immigration than ever before, provincial and federal authorities have to continue to cooperate so that immigrant services won't suffer, CJC-Q and JIAS say.

Cultural communities also have an important, "partnership" role to play with government in the immigrant adaptation process, the brief suggests, because in many cases such communities constitute the immigrants' first real "societe d'accueil."

The Jewish community's efforts (through JIAS) with Quebec to bring in 100 Jewish families from the former Soviet Union (and another 100 announced recently), the brief states, is a "good example" of the collaboration that is possible between cultural communities and goverment.

JIAS has also played a role in ensuring that Russian immigrants function in French. The brief states it is important that new arrivals continue to be furnished with the resources to do so.

In the brief, CJC and JIAS also recommend that:

- The criteria for "family reunification" be more flexible and "enlarged" by making eligible the sponsorship of married children, brothers and sisters. The age limit for eligible children should also be raised beyond age 18, the brief says;
- Refugee claimants should not be judged on the same basis as "other categories of immigrants" in terms of their ability to adapt to Quebec society.

"Traditionally, refugees have proved that they can quickly adapt to a new environment," the brief says.

They also have to have "the necessary resources to live in dignity in Quebec while their claims are evaluated. This includes the ability to get a work permit, social and medical benefits, legal aid and French-language instruction," the brief states.

- In the case of independent immigrants, some of the criteria for selection should conform more to standards used elsewhere in the world.

For example, the "economic viability" of immigrants from eastern Europe are "often underestimated" here, the brief says. It "strongly encouraged" the government "to closely examine this question."

At the beginning of the brief, CJC-Q and JIAS criticized the fact that this year's immigration policy consultation process, by being restricted to economic, linguistic and community "sectors," prevented a freer and more open exchange of ideas.

"This type of demarcation, does not contribute to the development of the best possible immigration policy," the brief stated.

"The population is better served by contacts between important contributors whatever their specific orientations."

Vancouver's Jewish population growing

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Since 1991, when the last Canadian census was taken, the Greater Vancouver Jewish population has grown by three per cent a year to 21,170.

The 1991 census showed the population at 19,375, an increase of 31 per cent in 10 years, as compared to a Toronto increase of 26.4 per cent.

The current population figures are an estimate by the planning department of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver based on an analysis by the Council of Jewish Federations, Statistics Canada and McGill University. A detailed analysis of each of the 11 federated Jewish communities in Canada is under preparation for release in the near future.

The Vancouver total represents 5.4 per cent of the Canadian Jewish population of 356,315. It makes up 87 per cent of the total British Columbia Jewish population, with Victoria accounting for another 6 per cent.

The Federation reports a mailing list of 5,504 households, with 68 per cent of them in Vancouver proper. The next largest concentration is in the Richmond area (Richmond, Surrey, Delta, White Rock and Langley), comprising 20.3 per cent of the mailing list. Other Greater Vancouver Jews live in the Burnaby area (4.4 per cent), and North and West Vancouver (7.1 per cent).

While half the Jewish population growth of Toronto and Montreal in the past decade is the result of immigration from abroad, the Federation reports Vancouver received more "movers" — interprovincial migrants versus immigrants. The trend continues.

Nearly 500 families registered their children in day schools in 1993 for a total of over 600 pupils. There are also day schools in the suburbs of Richmond, the Burnaby area and North Vancouver.

Singles of all ages make up nearly 20 per cent of the Greater Vancouver Jewish population, "many more than in the Canadian Jewish population as a whole," says the Federation report. Single-parent families account for 8.5 per cent of all Jewish families, but in Vancouver the percentage is 10.5 per cent, as compared to the overall Vancouver percentage of 9.7 per cent.

Vancouver has the highest rate in Jewish Canada of intermarried couples. The estimate is 24.5 per cent.

Monument to Christian victims said being planned at Auschwitz

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The former Carmelite convent at Auschwitz, which was finally ordered closed by Pope John Paul after a long dispute, is again in the eye of a storm.

There are allegations by a Canadian Catholic survivor of the death camp that a huge monument is to be erected to 70,000 Christian victims of Auschwitz on that same property, and that the building is being used by "ultra right-wing nationalist squatters" to disseminate racist propaganda.

These charges are denied by Krzysztof W. Kasprzyk, Polish consul general in Vancouver, where Sigmund Sobolewski, the Catholic survivor, distributed leaflets signed by 200, protesting these actions in front of the consul general's office.

However, Sobolewski told The CJN he has copies of the minutes of the council of the city of Oswiecim for October 1933 and April 1944, when the monument was discussed. He also has copies of stories about the monument proposal which appeared in three editions of the local Oswiecim newspaper.

The use of the former convent by the Christian organization, Association of War Victims (AWV), is still in dispute and is before the courts. Nathan Leipciger, chair of the Holocaust remembrance committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, and a member of the International Advisory Council on Auschwitz, said recently that the former convent should become a museum.

The Polish consul general said: "The Association of War Victims is the tenant in this building on the basis of a rental contract signed between its board of directors and Carmelite nuns who previously had resided there. Currently, the ownership litigation has been ongoing in the city court for Oswiecim and will be resolved by means of lawful property rights. No matter how the AWV organization is characterized, Mr. Sobolewski's statement about its dissemination of racist, anti-Semitic, and anti-Gypsy ideology is the pure product of his imagination."

Kasprzyk denied protests in the leaflet about the lack of recognition in Auschwitz that the majority of victims were Jewish, and that a plaque presented by Canadians honoring the Jewish martyrs who revolted and destroyed a crematorium at Birkenau is still lying unused in a basement.

The consul general said the International Council has agreed to regulations which bar such a plaque at Birkenau, but Sobolewski, who has made six visits to the death camp, claims he has been unable to get a copy of these regulations. He also cites many other examples at Auschwitz of what he describes as a "downplaying" of the fact that most victims were Jewish.

He claims that, though 90 per cent of the victims were Jewish, 90 per cent of the plaques installed at Auschwitz honor Christians.

Sobolewski alleges that Janus, the organization of war victims which now occupies the former convent, sent a protest note to the Vatican when the Pope ordered the Carmelite nuns to vacate the convent. He also says Janus is connected to the group which invited Russian nationalist Vladimir Zhirinowsky to Poland in March. "According to Polish journalists, the former Carmelite convent is now a hub of neo-Nazi, right-wing extremists who on weekends assemble there for conferences," he said.

Winnipeg Zionist elected JNF president

MONTREAL — Sid Halpern of Winnipeg, a longtime Zionist and community leader, was elected national president of the Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF) at its annual meeting recently in Montreal.

Succeeding Alan Posluns of Toronto, who held the position for three years, Halpern brings a wealth of leadership experience to the position.

"The Jewish National Fund has greatly benefited from his involvement over the years on a local and national level," the organization stated in a release.

Halpern is a chartered accountant and executive vice-president of Rice Sportswear. He is president of the Manitoba Fashion Institute of Manitoba Apparel Makers.

Halpern is married to Esther, who shares her husband's keen interest in Israel and in the work of JNF.

In his acceptance speech, Halpern stated that JNF is fortunate to have people committed to working together to bring the organization "from strength to strength."

Also at the meeting, JNF bid farewell to Morris Zilka, retiring executive vice-president and welcomed his replacement, Avner Regev.

Regev, described as an expert on Arab affairs, has a background in administration, organization and public relations.

El Al offers bonuses

MONTREAL — El Al Canada is now offering major flight bonuses to parents of participants in the Canadian Zionist Federation's (CZF) Youth and Hechalutz Israel summer programs.

El Al Canada general manager Yona Nechustan said each parent whose child flies El Al will receive a $200 bonus to be used towards round trip flights between Oct. 1, 1994 and March 31, 1995.

"It shows a tremendous commitment to Canada-Israel relations on the part of El Al and I'm quite impressed," said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, national co-chair of the Youth and Hechalutz Department.

"But even more impressive is that this move will influence parents to both send their children to Eretz Israel and visit our historic homeland themselves."

The CZF has been operating its "original Israel experience" summer programs for approximately 25 years. Most are geared towards educating young people about Israel's history, culture and Jewish heritage.

Enrolment for this summer is extremely limited. For more information on the programs, call (514) 486-9526 or visit the Israel Program Centre nearest you.

Diamond goes to Baycrest campaign

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Charles Diamond is resigning as national executive director of Canada-Israel Securities Ltd. (State of Israel Bonds) after 2½ years on the job.

Diamond is stepping down June 15 to become campaign director of a drive, beginning in 1995 and to stretch over several years, to raise $60 million for Toronto's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Diamond, 53, told The CJN he leaves Israel Bonds on a high note: last year, the organization sold $106 million worth of bonds and notes in Canada, and it was under Diamond's tenure that Bonds topped the $100 million mark in Canada for the first time.

But there have also been some rocky moments. Last year, Israel's finance minister created a stir when he suggested that the future of Israel Bonds be reassessed in light of cheaper U.S. loan guarantees.

After a storm of protest, the minister backtracked and assured purchasers that the government has no intention of dismantling the Bonds organization, founded in 1951 to fund Israel's infrastructure.

Charles Diamond

Also last year, Likud MK Meir Shetreet proposed abolishing Israel Bonds, saying they cost too much to finance.

In some circles, the Bonds organization is still under fire as outmoded, costly and one that burdens Israel with onerous interest payments and a bloated bureaucracy worldwide.

Earlier this year, many rabbis in the United States admitted they have been pressured by congregants not to make a pitch for Bonds purchases, as a protest against Israel's peace initiative.

Despite all that, Bonds topped the $1 billion global sales mark a few years ago. On the other hand, sales in the United States have slipped markedly.

Diamond, a former president of Toronto Jewish Congress (now Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto) is leaving because "an incredible opportunity opened up at Baycrest."

He will oversee a campaign whose goal is to raise money for research into Alzheimer's disease, community education and awareness, and referrals, intake and assessments.

The campaign also seeks to build up Baycrest's endowment fund and to add over 100 beds for Alzheimer's patients.

Hebrew U's president

Hanoch Gutfreund

Hanoch Gutfreund, president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, has faced difficult professional challenges in the past 19 months. The former rector of the university was vaulted into the role of acting president following the death of his predecessor Yoram Ben-Porath in a motor vehicle accident in October 1992. Gutfreund was formally named president in June of last year.

Most recently, the 73-day-long country-wide strike of university teaching staff demanded Gutfreund's concentrated attention, both as university president and as chair of the council of university presidents in Israel. He has also had to cope with allegations of rampant cheating at the Hebrew University, following an article which appeared in the Jerusalem Report early this year.

Gutfreund continues to guide the financial recovery of the university begun by Ben-Porath. His professional goals include promoting secondary school science education.

Gutfreund was born 58 years ago in Krakow, Poland, and immigrated to Israel in 1948. An alumnus of the Hebrew University, he is a theoretical physicist who has served on Israel's National Committee on Science Education and the Pedagogical Council of the Ministry of Education. He has been a faculty member at the university since 1968, following postdoctoral work at Standford University.

While in Toronto recently, Gutfreund spoke to CJN reporter Frances Kraft.

CJN: How is student morale at the university since the recent professors' strike which ended in March?

Gutfreund: It's not been the best year for the Hebrew University or for higher education in Israel.

The strike affected the entire system, and the ones who were affected most were the students. During the strike, there were several attempts on their part to express their frustration and bitterness. A group of them occupied my office for eight days and nights, but they were not very effective in their progress because only a minority participated.

However, at the end of the strike, when they came back to campuses, they were united behind the demand for a waiver of exams, which was finally granted to them as an option. I think it's to their credit that most of them waived that waiver and took the exams.

Now we are back to normal activity. The fact that I am here means that I felt I could leave.

CJN: Will students have to attend classes over the summer?

Gutfreund: We extended [classes] well into the summer, which is another heavy price that they are paying, because that means that they cannot earn [much] money to fund next year's tuition and expenses.

[However] we also postponed the beginning of the next academic year by three weeks [to the end of October] so that their vacation will not be too short. [Students will finish classes on July 23 instead of June 17.]

CJN: What was your role during the strike as Hebrew University president and as chair of the council of university presidents?

Gutfreund: I found myself [during] this ordeal confronting the faculty when I thought that their initial demands [for salary increases] were excessively high, but also confronting the government on the grounds that it was my belief that the academic faculty at the Hebrew University was grossly underpaid and they did deserve an increase. I played a major role in the negotiations on behalf of all the universities.

CJN: When the strike was settled, it was agreed that pay raises of more than 70 per cent would be paid out over several years. What is the mood of faculty members now?

Gutfreund: I believe that most are satisfied with the settlement. It is perceived by many as a significant achievement. I'm confident that we shall emerge from this crisis with renewed strength and determination to pursue our mission.

CJN: Are the Hebrew University students asking for money from the university?

Gutfreund: All students are asking for some kind of compensation — not necessarily from the university. They did file legal suits in the courts.

CJN: Has the Hebrew University or any of the other Israeli universities done anything to compensate the students?

Gutfreund: I cannot speak for all universities, but at our university there was a feeling that we should offer a special gesture after the students were deprived of classwork for such a long time.

[In addition to] the waiver of exams, [there were] increased hours of personal assistance and help in overcoming the backlog. We are also not charging the students in the dormitories for the extra weeks [in residence] because of the extension of the school year.

CJN: Does this apply to overseas students as well?

Gutfreund: The overseas students were not [affected]. We succeeded in convincing the association of professors to exempt the School for Overseas Students from the strike.

We felt that these students come for a limited time, and it would be difficult or almost impossible to compensate them for any such loss. The strike leaders accepted that argument.

CJN: How much of a problem is cheating at the Hebrew University, and how do you deal with it when it does occur?

Gutfreund: I would say that we have about 50 cases a year, but of varying degrees of transgression. In many cases the students are found not guilty. In others punishments are imposed.

We have a student body of 23,000 students. On the average, everyone takes a dozen exams a year, so you have something like 150,000 exams per year. If you find 50 cases of [cheating], this is not such a problem.

CJN: Have the allegations of rampant cheating in the January 13 Jerusalem Report article hurt Hebrew U's image?

Gutfreund: I don't think so. It may have offended the people who were interviewed for that article, who felt that they were grossly misquoted.

CJN: Is the council of university presidents examining the issue of cheating?

Gutfreund: No. The council of presidents of all the universities is not looking at any such questions which every university should deal with through its own institutions and academic procedures.

CJN: How did the reality of your first year as president compare to your expectations?

Gutfreund: When I accepted this position, I did not expect that during this first year, the university would be embroiled in such a crisis [the strike] and certainly it diverted my energy and attention from the issues which I felt I should have addressed [and which] are still a challenge.

CJN: What are your priorities right now?

Gutfreund: The priorities, in very general terms, are academic planning for the university in a very rapidly changing world — on both a national and a regional level, and also in the Jewish world. We do consider ourselves the university of the Jewish people, and we have developed institutions and projects which reflect and demonstrate that.

CJN: How has the peace process had an impact on the university?

Gutfreund: In many ways. Our scholars have been involved, both as partners in cooperative projects with Egyptian, Palestinian, Jordanian and Moroccan institutions and scholars, and also by studying problems relating to the peace process and making the results of those studies available to the negotiating teams.

A Hebrew University professor of economics [Efraim Kleinman], for example, has been a member of the team which has negotiated the agreement on financial and commercial relations.

With Egypt we have a joint project studying the marine biology and ecosystem of the Gulf of Aqaba. We have a joint project on tropical diseases.

We have projects with Palestinians on issues of water. These are fairly new projects, because they're a corollary of the [peace] process.

CJN: What percentage of the student population at Hebrew University is Arab?

Gutfreund: We don't know, because we never asked them. Nowhere on our application form is a student asked to identify his religion. The nationality, yes, but Arab students are Israeli citizens, so you cannot tell by that.

There is a fair percentage. I would say that we have about 7 per cent. Between 1,200 to 1,500 Arab students would be my guess.

CJN: Does Hebrew U have any projects concerning road safety in Israel?

Gutfreund: Yes. There is one in the planning stage. We formed a study group [after Ben-Porath's accident]. Actually there were two scholars who [had] studied certain aspects of road accidents before that, but after that there was a feeling that we should launch a coordinated interdisciplinary effort. We are particularly [interested in] the human element. There is the technological element — the quality of roads and cars, but there is also the educational, psychological, human decision element, the cognitive part, the fatigue, all of that, and we thought that we could contribute something.

CJN: Reports following Professor Ben-Porath's death indicated that the university had just emerged from financial crisis. How is the financial situation now?

Gutfreund: At present we face a deficit of something like 5 per cent of our entire level of activity in all our budgets. We have to adapt our activity to the available resources. We are not the only university in the world that faces this problem. We cannot do everything. We have to be selective, and that's part of [our] planning process.

The situation has improved significantly. A few years ago, we faced a major financial crisis which forced management of the university and the board of governors to implement a recovery plan in 1987. It's a matter of one to three years [until I expect the university to be debt-free].

CJN: How has the Hebrew University addressed the needs of new olim in recent years?

Gutfreund: We initiated several programs offering opportunities for retraining to professions which are in greater demand in Israel. Hundreds of new olim went through those programs, and that facilitated their absorption.

The school for overseas students plays a dual role. One is [to offer] academic programs, the other one is to serve as a preparatory school for those who immigrate to Israel but lack the necessary skills required for admission, like Hebrew language, or English.

We did not relax our admission requirements for olim. Whoever applies has to compete for the available places with all the others.

CJN: Have you had any Ethiopian students go through that program?

Gutfreund: Very few. With Ethiopians, it's not just the language. Much more is needed. But we do have a few Ethiopian students who have already graduated from the Hebrew University.

CJN: Is the university doing anything to promote science education in Israeli high schools?

Gutfreund: The university is doing a lot. The university is training teachers, developing course work and curricula, but also on campus, we have constructed science laboratories where high school teachers can go with their high school students to perform experiments which are part of the curriculum.

CJN: Are you doing anything specific to encourage female students to pursue careers in science?

Gutfreund: I don't think you have to do anything specific for that. I believe that if you let it alone, it will happen.

CJN: Are there women scientists on staff at the Hebrew University?

Gutfreund: Yes, but not to the extent that we would like to see. It certainly does not reflect the proportion of women in society.

I don't think that one should do anything artificial to change it. Our attitudes are changing. Society's attitudes are changing, and it's reflected in the ever-increasing percentage of women on the university faculty.

CJN: What message do you bring to Canadian Jews?

Gutfreund: Just to continue their very generous support and involvement. I'm very impressed with the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, and I'm particularly impressed with the fact that I find here a generation of young people who are assuming leadership roles in the community and on behalf of the Hebrew University. This disproves the myth that compassion and understanding for worthy causes in Israel is declining and will disappear after our generation has made its contribution. I find that, at least in Canada, there is ample evidence that this is not going to be the case. That is something very encouraging.

Waldheim says CIA files reveal coverup by Americans

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VIENNA — Former Austrian President Kurt Waldheim wants the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to make public its files on him, in the wake of new charges that the United States helped cover up Waldheim's Nazi past.

"I support the publishing" of the CIA files, Waldheim told the Austrian daily Der Standard recently. "I have nothing against it."

Waldheim was reacting to recent allegations that he had cooperated with the CIA during the early 1960s and that as a result, American authorities covered up his service in a German army unit linked to World War II atrocities.

In 1986, while Waldheim ran for president of Austria, the World Jewish Congress (WJC) launched an inquiry into his wartime activities with the Germany army, or Wehrmacht, in the Balkans during the war.

Despite the inquiry's conclusions that Waldheim had lied about his past, the former two-term UN Secretary General was elected president in June of that year.

Waldheim went on to serve as Austria's president, a largely ceremonial post, for six years, but was regarded as a pariah by most of the international community.

During that period, he remained on the U.S. watch list barring people of questionable background from entering the United States.

Waldheim's background was again brought into question following a recent report in The New York Times, which disclosed confidential documents from the U.S. Embassy in Vienna between 1961 and 1968.

According to the report, nearly identical wording was found in cables sent to Washington when Waldheim was appointed Austria's U.N. ambassador in 1966 and again in 1968, when he took up his post as Austrian foreign minister.

In the cables, Waldheim was described as an "outstanding personality in the Austrian Foreign Ministry" and as "highly cooperative and helpful in supporting U.S. interests."

The Times questioned why the United States had supported Waldheim's election as UN secretary-general in 1971, even though his name could be found on a list of "suspicious people" dating back to 1948 in connection with his wartime duties in the Balkans.

The CIA carried out a security check on Waldheim in 1972, but found nothing unusual in his background. That fact is being taken as proof of his prior cooperation with the State Department.

Waldheim told Der Standard that the Times story was "a continuation of the defamation campaign" against him in a new guise.

"If I had a friendly attitude toward the U.S.A., it does not mean that I was an agent, or spying," he said.

Waldheim added that nothing "more than a friendly attitude toward the U.S.A. could be filed about me, because there was no more to be said, as nothing exists of that sort."

In March, the Justice Department released a formerly secret report leveling accusations that Waldheim participated in war crimes under Nazi command during World War II.

Kurt Waldheim

The report, written in 1987, concludes that "Waldheim assisted or otherwise participated in persecution because of race, religion, national origin or political opinion."

The report also states that in memoranda contesting the attempt to bar him from the United States, Waldheim "offered explanations of historical events which are so completely inconsistent with documented facts as to smack of rank distortion."

Waldheim failed to rebut the case against him or otherwise demonstrate he did not take part in activities of which he's been accused, the report says.

It is not known why the former Bush administration kept the report from the public.

The WJC had long sought to make the report public so that the story of Waldheim would be known.

The report states that, as a lieutenant for the German army between 1942 and 1945, Waldheim was involved in the deportation and deaths of nearly 3,000 Greek Jews.

He also played a part in the transfer of civilian prisoners to the SS for use as slave labor, the mass deportation of civilians to concentration and death camps, the utilization of anti-Semitic propaganda and the mistreatment and execution of Allied prisoners.

Survivors, gays clash in Israel at Yad Vashem

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Holocaust survivors and a visiting international group of gay men and lesbians clashed at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial here last Monday, as the gay community held a ceremony to honor homosexuals who perished under the Nazis.

Holocaust survivors greeted the group of about 100 gay and lesbian activists with protest banners as they arrived at the memorial.

But worse was to come inside the cavernous Hall of Remembrance after a Reform rabbi, himself gay, began reciting Kaddish.

A bearded man with a heavy Russian accent screamed, "My grandfather was killed for refusing to have sexual relations with the camp commandant. You are desecrating this place, you homos!"

The group of homosexuals did its best to continue, reciting the Kaddish and singing Hannah Senesh's "Eli, Eli" poem, many of them in tears. Some were attacked by the protesters and had to be restrained by their friends from fighting back.

The ceremony marked the first time the Nazi persecution of homosexuals had been commemorated at Yad Vashem, and it had aroused controversy in the days leading up to it.

A full-page advertisement placed in The Jerusalem Post by a group of 19 rabbis called the ceremony an "abomination" and threatened a boycott of the Holocaust memorial.

The ceremony was sponsored by the Society for the Protection of Personal Rights, Israel's principal gay rights group, as the kickoff for a month of events in Israel for and about gay men and lesbians.

Many of the participants, here for the World Congress of Gay and Lesbian Jewish Organizations, were deeply upset by the reception they received at Yad Vashem.

A young delegate from England said sarcastically: "This makes us feel very much at home in Israel!"

Arafat claims Jerusalem as Palestine capital

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — As the newly named members of the Palestinian governing authority prepare to arrive in Jericho, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat has again sparked controversy by naming Jerusalem as the capital of "Arab Palestine."

The bombshell, contained in an interview with Radio Algeria last Wednesday, came hard on the heels of Arafat's now-infamous remarks in Johannesburg last month, when he called for a jihad (holy war) to "liberate" Jerusalem.

Arafat later said he used the Arabic word to refer to a peaceful struggle.

During his Johannesburg speech, and in subsequent remarks, Arafat also implied he could break the agreement between the PLO and Israel whenever he pleased.

In last Wednesday's interview, Arafat said United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 specifically recognizes that Jerusalem is an integral and indivisible part of the territories Israel conquered in June 1967.

"It is on that basis that we went ahead with the Madrid and Oslo talks," said Arafat, referring to negotiations that preceded the signing of the Palestinian self-rule accord.

In a letter the PLO leader sent to the heads of the world's non-aligned states, who met last week in Cairo, Arafat said that remarks about Jerusalem made this week by Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin violated the autonomy agreement signed in Cairo last month.

Earlier last week, Rabin said Jerusalem would remain the undivided capital of the Jewish people "forever."

He added that Israel will take steps to prevent the establishment and operation of any Palestinian autonomous agencies in Jerusalem.

"Someone in Tunisia [Arafat] said something today. So he spoke," Rabin said. "You see Jerusalem is united. It is our capital, the capital of the Jewish people and will remain this way forever," Rabin told Jewish National Fund leaders in Jerusalem.

Libya's official press agency wrote that Rabin was humiliating Arafat over the Jerusalem issue.

According to the Declaration of Principles signed last fall by Israel and the PLO, Jerusalem was to be the subject of "final-status" negotiations, to begin in no later than two years.

Preparations are meanwhile underway for the arrival in Jericho of some of the senior members of the newly formed Palestinian governing authority, which will have overall responsibility for Palestinian affairs in the autonomous regions of Jericho and the Gaza Strip.

Among those expected in Jericho, perhaps by this week, are Nabil Sha'ath and Ahmed Karia, both of whom hold economic portfolios.

Some 18 offices have already been prepared for the members of the authority, which will be led by Arafat.

Also being set up in Jericho is a special office to assist victims of the intifadah.

The arrival in Jericho of the council members will be the first test of their popular standing at a time when there is sharp criticism of many of the nominations.

Critics are charging that veteran Palestinian leaders who stayed in the West Bank and Gaza during the difficult years of the intifadah have been overlooked, and that plum posts have been given to many whose sole qualification is their closeness to Arafat.

In Gaza last week, a leader of Arafat's mainstream Fatah movement told the Israeli daily Ha'aretz he "felt sorry" for the members of the Palestinian authority.

"They have to fulfil promises without having the means to keep those promises," said Hisham Abd a-Rajek.

He was referring in particular to the council's desperate lack of funds. A number of foreign countries had promised aid in the wake of last fall's signing of the self-rule accord, but the money has so far not materialized.

Last Tuesday, Arafat appealed to U.S. President Bill Clinton to encourage those who promised aid to honor those pledges.

Earlier last week, Israel paid, for the last time, the salaries of the tens of thousands it had employed in the civil administration of Gaza.

Rabin had warned earlier that a financial crisis serious enough to disrupt the progress of Palestinian self-rule would occur if the promised foreign aid did not arrive soon.

IDF, Hezbollah clash at Lebanese border

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A tense calm prevailed on both sides of the Lebanese border last weekend, after Katyusha rocket attacks forced Israel's northern residents to spend Saturday and Sunday in bomb shelters.

Amid ongoing clashes in the security zone, the Israel Defence Force (IDF) has boosted its forces along the border and in the zone, primarily with tanks and long-range artillery ready to strike back if U.S. mediation efforts to restore calm should fail.

Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Mordechai, who toured towns and villages in the North on Friday, said IDF and South Lebanese Army troops were on full alert and prepared for any eventuality.

Meanwhile, Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah last Friday threatened to wage suicide attacks against Israel, declaring that the extremist Shi'ite organization's battle with the "Zionist enemy" had entered a new phase.

Nasrallah spoke at a mass funeral in Beirut for several of those killed in the Israel Air Force strike on a Hezbollah training base in Lebanon's northern Bekaa Valley before dawn last Thursday.

As many as 45 Hezbollah activists, many of them young men due to undergo training in terrorist tactics and guerrilla warfare, were killed in the raid and scores more wounded.

"Victory for Islam and death to Israel," chanted hundreds of mourners at the funeral ceremony in Beirut, where coffins and in some cases bodies were held aloft and passed over the heads of the crowd.

"Yesterday we had dozens of suicide attackers. Now we have not hundreds, but thousands. We have decided to cut the hands of the Jews from the Muslim lands," said Nasrallah.

The rocket attacks retaliating against Israel began last Thursday afternoon, with several salvoes to the Western and Central Galilee.

Rockets fell in other parts of the region, including the Galilee Panhandle. The last attack occured early Friday morning, when a number of rockets fell harmlessly.

There were no Israeli casualties in any of the attacks, and damage to property was minimal, although in some areas, explosions from rockets started fires, which were quickly extinguished.

Israel maintains that the air strike on a strictly military target was legitimate, whereas the rocket attacks by Hezbollah and other organizations on northern settlements were a violation of mutual understandings.

Despite the rocket attacks, schools throughout the North were open on Friday, although most residents opted to spend the night in security rooms and bomb shelters as a precaution.

There were also clashes between Hezbollah gunmen and soldiers from the Fijian contingent of the United Nations peacekeeping force.

One Fijian soldier was killed and three others were wounded in the clashes in which a member of the Hezbollah was also killed.

THE PUZZLE OF LIFE

Actresses Tzippy Shavit (left) and Yona Elian, together with some children suffering from cystic fibrosis, are seen at the opening of a fund raising drive to raise a million shekels for cystic fibrosis research. Behind them is the Puzzle of Life that will be used in the drive. The drive will try to sell individual parts of a thousand piece jigsaw puzzle at 1,000 shekels each. At present about 300 children in Israel have the disease. [Israpet photo]

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

ORTENBERG — HUBERMAN

My correspondent's maiden name was Ortenberg, which she describes correctly as the name of a town in Germany near Frankfort-am-Main. She enquires whether there may be another origin for the surname of her ancestors who lived in Ukraine and Russia. The name is quite common in Odessa, Ukraine, although it probably originated in Germany and was carried intact on moving to Ukraine.

Huberman (a variation of Haberman) derives from the German and Jewish word for oats and probably describes a dealer in oats.

FOX

Abraham Shusterman, rabbi emeritus of Temple Shalom in Naples, Fla., asked me how Fox became a Jewish surname. There are several explanations.

The houses in the ghetto of Frankfurt had no numbers, but were identified instead by symbols. The best known is Rothschild — red shield, from which sprang a world-renowned dynasty. One of the houses bore the insignia of a fox.

"Fox" may also have been given as a nickname to designate a cunning or red-headed person.

League hopes to challenge vote

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada is working with the Ontario Gurdwaras Committee, an organization representing 11 Sikh temples, to find ways to challenge the decision.

"The cowboy hat issue is an affront to everything," said veteran Murray Davis, 71, of Sault Ste. Marie. "It's assinine and childish."

Davis, a veteran of the Italian campaign, is one of six Jewish members of Legion Branch 25. He said his 1,650 fellow branch members have welcomed his presence, even suggesting that a rabbi preside over the rededication of the local cenotaph three years ago. In January, Davis proposed Sikhs and Jews with covered heads wear a black poppy inside the hall to show respect for the dead.

"If you're out of the place, what good are you," he explained. "If you're inside, no matter how you got in, they'll learn about you. The bottom line is, did you get in? You can't fight a battle from outside."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka is the Jewish chaplain for the Legion's Dominion Command. Rabbi Bulka, 50, said he believes Legion members voted out of ignorance, not racism. "It's a mistake to believe all legionnaires are bigoted," he said from Ottawa. "The issue is there is an injustice that has to be corrected."

The News in Brief

AI Calls for Vanunu's Release

OTTAWA — Amnesty International (AI) has called on Israel to release Mordechai Vanunu, the former nuclear technician who has been held in solitary confinement by Israeli authorities, after they abducted and tried him in secret eight years ago.

Vanunu is serving an 18-year sentence after being convicted at an in camera hearing of treason and espionage for providing a British newspaper with secrets about Israel's nuclear program in 1986.

AI says Israeli authorities acted illegally when they kidnapped Vanunu in Italy and when they held him in solitary confinement, which AI says is "cruel, inhuman and degrading."

AI says that in Vanunu's case, Israel "has shown a determiniation to go far beyond what is legitimate under international human rights law."

Hungarian Jews to Get New Centre

BUDAPEST — As the result of an initiative begun two years ago by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, Hungarian Jews will soon have a new community centre here.

The building that will house the centre — a pre-existing structure in downtown Budapest — is being renovated for community activities and is slated to open Sept. 1.

Costs for the new centre are being paid in part by a $300,000 grant from the London-based Central British Fund/ World Jewish Relief.

The new community centre will house a Shalom Club for Holocaust survivors, who number about 30,000 in Hungary. It will also house a social club, cultural centre, library and a computerized educational system connected to all Hungarian Jewish schools.

German Soldiers Investigated

BONN — German authorities are investigating allegations that soldiers in the country's most elite honor guard shouted neo-Nazi and anti-Semitic slogans on a bus near here.

Reporting an incident that took place in mid-May, eyewitnesses said seven soldiers who were apparently drunk began shouting anti-Semitic and xenophobic slogans on a bus on their way back to their barracks near Bonn.

According to the witnesses, the soldiers, who were dressed in civilian clothes for an evening out, shouted "Jews should be gassed" and "foreigners out."

The police are also investigating claims that the soldiers physically attacked one passenger who tried to quiet them down.

When the soldiers got out of hand, the bus driver reportedly closed the doors to the bus and called the police, who held five soldiers for questioning.

Two of the soldiers got out of the bus before police arrived but they too were later brought in for questioning.

The soldiers were members of Germany's most prestigious honor guard, which greets foreign heads of state.

A spokesman for prosecutors in Bonn announced last week that charges would be pressed against one soldier at least, and that the investigation would continue regarding the other six.

Proposal on Jewish Facilities

BERLIN — In the wake of the vandalism of two Jewish cemeteries in the central German state of Hesse, a spokesman for the leftist Green Party in the Hesse state parliament has proposed that Jewish graveyards and synagogues be classified as historical monuments.

Fritz Hertle said last week that he made the proposal "in order to strengthen the cultural interests of the authorities and to protect" Jewish institutions.

Local police said all 11 gravestones were overturned and some of them broken during the recent attack on one of the cemeteries, in the town of Beerfelden.

Hertle said that in the western German town of Wiesbaden, the Green Party had set up a citizen's initiative to have Jewish cemeteries and synagogues in Germany put under protection.

He called on Germans to pay more attention to the historical importance of Jewish cemeteries and to help prevent "such shameful attacks by anti-Semitic right-wing extremists."

New Zealand Jews Upset

AUCKLAND, New Zealand — The New Zealand Jewish community has reacted angrily to an announcement that the government has granted residence to a South African white supremacist leader, Jan Smith.

Wendy Ross, president of the New Zealand Jewish Council, said last week the council wrote to New Zealand's immigration minister opposing the granting of residency to Smith.

Smith, a former leader of the South African Church of the Creator, immigrated here last month.

Immigration Minister Roger Maxwell said there is no basis in law to deport Smith.

The Church of the Creator, a pseudoreligious group belonging to the neo-Nazi Christian Identity movement, preaches "racial holy war" against blacks and Jews.

Smith established the South African section of the church in 1979.

Doctors in the House

JERUSALEM — The immigration wave from the former Soviet Union has doubled the number of trained doctors in Israel, but only a quarter of the arrivals have found work in their field, the Absorption Ministry said last week.

The 12,000 doctors who have arrived since late 1989 are equivalent to the number of those already practicing in the country, the ministry said in a statement.

Of the new arrivals, some 3,000 physicians have found work in their field and now constitute a fifth of Israeli doctors. Another 5,000 passed equivalence exams, but have not found medical positions.

The statement said that despite the saturation of their job market, 15 of every 1,000 immigrants currently arriving are doctors and 29 are nurses.

Delegation From Cuba Visits

JERUSALEM — A two-member Cuban delegation arrived here last week for a visit their Israeli Communist Party hosts said was aimed at warming ties that were severed over 20 years ago.

Maria Dolores Ortiz Diaz and Eduardo Mereros Gonzalez, officials from the Cuban Institute for Friendship Between Peoples, were scheduled to tour Israel for 10 days, Gonzales said.

Boaz Modai, a Foreign Ministry spokesman, said no ministry officials will meet with the two, and that relations with Cuba, one of the last communist strongholds, remained unchanged.

"It's only a first step which we hope will facilitate eventually reestablishing diplomatic relations," said Yoram Gozansky, an Israeli Communist Party spokesman.

What's Bugging Them?

JERUSALEM — A swarm of mosquitoes has succeeded in doing what politicians, idealists and peacemakers have often dreamed about but rarely achieved.

The pesky insects have feasted on residents of the Jewish town of Othniel and Arab town of Rabud, who last week held a joint demonstration against the mosquito invasion that has plagued the area.

About 100 people joined forces along a main highway, about 16 km from Hebron, to demonstrate against the common enemy.

Explaining their gripe, protester Avia Kedari of Othniel told Army Radio that tens of thousands of mosquitoes breeding in a sewage-filled stream had infested their homes.

Kedari said the 10-year-old problem is particularly acute this year.

"Our children cannot sleep" because of the smell and the buzz of mosquitoes, said Mohammed Taleb Ktat of Rabud.

Asked whether the cooperation is acceptable to both communities, Ktat replied, "This isn't a problem. We have a common emergency."

"We want to find a solution to this so we can all sleep peacefully," added Kedari.

Argentina Blanks Israel

TEL AVIV — Some 40,000 soccer fans packed Ramat Gan's National Stadium last Tuesday night to witness two-time world champions Argentina beat Israel 3-0.

Argentina, with the great Diego Maradona at the helm, took the lead midway through the game. Then, in the second half, they completely overwhelmed the Israelis with two more goals.

The atmosphere in the stadium took on a distinct South American air, as thousands of Argentinian fans cheered on their team with their banners draped over the length of the touchline barrier.

Prior to the match, Maccabi Haifa midfielder Eyal Berkowitz was crowned Israel's footballer of the year by President Ezer Weizman.

Three Companies Fined

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Commerce Department fined three companies last week for allegedly complying with the Arab economic boycott of Israel.

A total of $54,000 in fines were levied against SSC Medical Instrumentation, Inc. of Concord, Mass.; the Los Angeles branch of Habib Bank AG Zurich; and World Trade Venture, Inc. of Berkeley Heights, N.J.

The companies each agreed to pay the fines, but they neither admitted nor denied the allegations.

By RABBI DAVID J. GOLDBERG

Being a transplanted American on Canadian soil, I cannot help but compare the rebellion of Korah, about which we read in this week's Torah portion to the signing of the American Declaration of Independence, whose 218th anniversary will be celebrated in about three weeks. They were both founded on seemingly the same foundations; the freedom of the individual to play a role in creating the law. But the Americans succeeded and Korah failed. Why did Korah not succeed if his claims were just?

The Torah does not hold it against Korah that he led a rebellion against Moses. The reason for his downfall was that his true motivation was ultimately unjust.

On the surface it appears that Korah argued for a noble cause — a more democratic society — just as the American colonists did when they rose up against England and as did Thomas Jefferson when he authored the Declaration of Independence. Jefferson said that "All men are created equal." Korah likewise said to Moses, "You take too much upon yourself, seeing that all the congregation are holy, every one of them and the Lord is among them." Thus Korah, like Jefferson, argued for a people's democracy.

But the rabbis of the Talmud and Midrash concluded that Korah's rebellion was an "unholy controversy" and thus doomed to failure. The commentator Malbim comments regarding this, "Our sages wished to point out that in a holy or heavenly cause both sides are united by one purpose to further unselfish, divine ends. However, in a controversy pursued for unholy ends, for personal advancement and the like, then even those who have come together on one side are not really united. Each is governed by their own calculations of what they stand to gain and are ready to cut each other's throats if it serves their own interests."

The Midrash strives to prove just this point. According to the rabbis Korah was really interested in becoming the High Priest. He was upset that he had been overlooked for that position by Moses, who was his cousin, and that he had not been made the chief of the Levitical clan of Kehat. That job went to another cousin, Elizaphan. Korah's cohorts, Dathan and Abiram, also had personal axes to grind. They were from the tribe of Reuben, who, as the firstborn of the patriarch Jacob, were entitled to the highest offices of political and spiritual leadership of the Israelites. Instead, they complained, those positions had been given to the descendants of Levi, Judah, and Joseph. The 250 princes that Korah gathered around himself also argued that the priesthood should not be given out as a hereditary title, but according to individual prestige and distinction.

This is what Korah meant when he said that "all of them are holy." This is an assertion that the individual's selfish ambitions outweigh their group mission to be a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation." Korah and his followers interpreted their role of being "chosen people" to mean that they could have superiority and privilege, rather than meaning that they agreed to shoulder extra responsibilities.

And while Korah pretended to represent the poor and deprived masses, the Midrash tell us further that his past was not what it seemed. In Egypt Korah was the treasurer to Pharoah. In this capacity he acquired a considerable fortune for himself, which he carried into the desert.

Korah's rebellion failed because of its impure motives and corrupt methods. But some of the ideas of this first rebellion against an establishment remained behind and produced better results in later generations.

In contrast to Korah's uprising, the American revolution succeeded precisely because it was not the invention of one man who was seeking personal gain, but because a nation was fed up with not being able to decide its own fate. George Washington had no great ambition to become the first president of the United States. He was actually called out of retirement from his Virginia farm because the Continental Congress trusted him the most. The American revolution was fought by people for all of them, not for the greater glory of a few wealthy leaders who were miffed because they felt that they deserved more.

There are certainly wrongs to be righted and people to be helped who cannot speak for themselves. But we must be vigilant when it comes to deciding who to allow to speak to them. The motivation of leaders, whether appointed by the community or self-appointed, should be carefully scrutinized. For those who cloak their self-interest with apparent concern for the masses will eventually tread them downward even farther and cause great anguish in the end as did Korah.

Courts say immigrants are Jewish

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's Interior Ministry has agreed not to refer new immigrants to rabbinical courts to determine their Jewishness for purposes of civil registration.

The decision is seen as a victory for champions of the separation of religion and state here, while the fervently Orthodox are calling the development dangerous.

The ministry agreement was presented by the Attorney General to the Supreme Court late last month, in response to a petition filed by the Reform Movement's Religious Action Center.

The petitioners alleged that the ministry's Population Registry was making referrals to the rabbinical courts, which is illegal.

In documents, David Efrati, director of the Registry, denied his division was registering new immigrants to the religious courts.

And the head of the rabbinical courts, Rabbi Eliyahu Ben Dahan, submitted affidavits agreeing that rabbinical courts had no jurisdiction in the matter.

The Supreme Court "has long established the principle" that the Law of Return — which grants certain rights to immigrants determined to be of Jewish descent — and the population registry are civil matters, said Rabbi Uri Regev, head of the Reform center.

As such, they are not based on Halachah and halachic definitions of who is a Jew, he added.

Rabbi Regev said he had been seeking redress on the matter from the Attorney General's office for more than two years.

He has maintained that the rabbinical courts only have the "incidental authority" to judge Jewish status in matters squarely under their jurisdiction, such as in marriage.

Meanwhile, the fervently Orthodox press greeted the legal agreement with strong criticism. It said a "red line" had been crossed in the increasingly difficult effort to determine the Jewish status of immigrants.

It should "cause sleeplessness to all Jews" concerned about the "enormous assimilation of gentiles into the Jewish fold," the World Rabbinic Committee on Conversion was quoted as stating.

Jerusalem meeting plants seeds of cooperation

By BRAHM EILEY
Special to The CJN

Last year Professor Ron Pundak and Yair Hirschfeld, both Israelis, inadvertently made history, when the informal talks they had begun with Abu Allaa, the PLO finance minister, concerning possible spheres of economic cooperation became the official channel to negotiate the Declaration of Principles between Israel and the PLO.

Informal get-togethers in the interest of resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict are becoming more common in Israel. And as has long been the case in this region, it is in the business arena that mutual benefits — political, social and economic — are most readily found. Since the PLO-Israeli talks became public, there have been a number of business agreements established between Israelis and Palestinians.

Shortly before the Hebron massacre, one such gathering occurred. Its purpose was to help initiate a meeting between Palestinians and the mayor of Jerusalem. The purpose of the proposed meeting was to discuss cooperation in building schools, housing, medical facilities and industrial areas in East Jerusalem (which is part of the West Bank), the majority of which is inhabited by Palestinians.

The gathering was held at the apartment of Zeev Baran, a Jerusalem architect and planner, who has been working with Arabs for twenty years. Baran first worked for the Israel Civil Administration in the West Bank, and later on his own independent projects. He specializes in building medical facilities, and recently returned from a meeting in Cairo organized by Yasser Arafat's brother, Fathy Arafat, who is expected to be Palestine's first health minister. Baran had been invited to serve as an advisor on the future Palestinian state.

Although he is Jewish and of Eastern European descent, Baran resembles King Hussein of Jordan and is no less elegant and refined in manner. His dexterity at putting people at ease comes from an acute attentiveness to his immediate environment. But it is his passion for peace which led him to spend many an hour in meetings like this one, where discussions that people can only dream of both inside and outside of Israel really do happen.

On the far wall there is a collection of fine glassware and paintings of Israel and France by Baran's friends and a rare multicolored kilim. The spacious apartment is warm, full of wonderful wood finishings and specially designed rooms. On this damp February morning in Jerusalem the fireplace is crackling. What these men are discussing is a common subject in this apartment.

Osman Hallak, a West Bank businessman and chief editor of East Jerusalem's An-Nahar (one of two Arabic dailies in Israel and the Territories) is getting irritated.

"Don't be like 67," he cautions Farouk Otman Halad, a Palestinian-Jordanian businessman with residence in Jerusalem. Halad is well-dressed and sports a thin moustache. He has brought along another man who remains silent. The man appears to understand Arabic perfectly, but looks Northern European.

"You must not talk about unity, because unity is impossible," Hallak continues and then adds: "Remember, with or without the peace agreement we must move ahead with building East Jerusalem."

As the two argue, Amir Chesin, who has been in charge of Arab affairs for the Mayor's Office of Jerusalem for twenty years first under "liberal" Teddy Kollek and now under Likudnik Ehud Olmert, says to the group in a jovial way: "See how well they get along." Hallak, who is in heated discussion with Halad, overhears Chesin's comment and brushes it aside with his hand. It was Chesin who earlier introduced the idea of arranging a meeting between Palestinians and the Jerusalem Mayor's Office.

Chesin is a heavy set Jewish Arab with big hands, a wide mouth and a strong presence. In front of him on the table, by the Turkish coffee and sweets, is his portable telephone which he keeps adjusting every five minutes or so.

Halad finally backs down; it will not be possible he laments to wait for a unified position on Palestinian construction policy in East Jerusalem. At this moment Baran glides into the conversation. He has been carefully watching the two men and waiting for the drop in their voices. Quietly, yet directly he says: "So, let us agree that we will meet with the Mayor's Office."

Baran looks to Hallak, Halad, the Northern European with the goatee and Chesin for their approval. With it, he says he will begin to draft a letter that will be general enough so that all those who are invited will feel it represents them.

"But will the new mayor be open to this?" Halad asks still doubting the situation. The idea of such a letter is a direct challenge to Israeli policy. Economic development and business cooperation between Palestinians and Israelis take some adjustment.

"He has to be," Chesin says adamantly. They both play with their worry beads.

"Let us not go over the obvious," Baran interjects. "What we must establish with the new mayor is that East Jerusalem will be maintained and built like any other part of this country. If it will not be, then we need to know this as well."

As the group chides each other over who will be invited to the meeting and have their name on the letter, it becomes clear that if the mayor is not open to working with this group of wealthy Palestinians, they will not build in East Jerusalem.

The difficulty for Palestinians in obtaining building and business permits from the Israeli government to build in their own villages is a highly disputed issue which stretches back to policies instituted by Israel after the War of 1967. Even the most casual observer can see the difference in development between Israel and the Territories.

Historically, the mayor must provide a small amount for building in East Jerusalem. It would seem foolish, with the new peace agreement, if he did not capitalize on the Palestinians' interest. Time will tell however, if the Palestinians have the leverage to gain a real change in policy.

When the meeting ends, Baran introduces me to Hallak who must leave soon. He suggests we go to the den to talk.

"I think business must lead the way and when it comes to what we must do, it is obvious that we must be like the Jews," Hallak says straight off, his wiry frame full of energy. "We lack a pragmatism, a sense of pride and a sense of doing for ourselves and like them we need to create this in ourselves. That is not to say, Israel's policy has helped. Their policy — and they should know better — has been stupid! If you let people live like rats in a maze, as in Gaza or East Jerusalem, how else do you expect people to react and feel psychologically. That is why if the Israelis are going to be involved in this process it has to be done slowly and covertly or else it will damage our development process.

"As for East Jerusalem," he continues without much of a breath, "it is not just a question of property values. It is not just a question of how much profit we can make in building, because profit, the way it looks right now is not so large. Of course if the situation eases, property values will go up. But profit is not my motivation. With or without the peace agreement, we need change."

Baran's perspective mirrors Hallak's quite closely. On the one hand, he feels it is time for the Israelis to wake up and treat the Palestinians as equals. On the other hand, he is frustrated with the Palestinian leadership. On many occasions, Baran has urged the PLO's representative in the West Bank, Faisal al-Husseini, to run in the Jerusalem elections. But Husseini has told him, that if he ran it would be "admitting defeat and therefore be too dangerous."

"In the end, it is the Israelis who will be most involved with the Palestinians," Baran explains after everyone has left the meeting. "The idea some people have that we are somehow going to be separated is fantasy. We are tied together by geography, history and economics. Once the international money disappears, who else is going to invest with the Palestinians or buy from the Palestinians and who else has any real interest to?"

Baran knows full well what he is speaking about. A map, which he prepared for the Israeli government on Israeli and Palestinian settlements in the West Bank shows a world of intertwined communities. Jerusalem itself is a city shared between two peoples and there are hundreds of thousands of Palestinians living throughout Israel proper. It is only in Gaza, where Palestinian children know of the Israelis as the men in green with machine guns, that there is less of a mixture.

The Gaza Strip is a forty-minute drive from Tel Aviv and economically has little option but to be involved with Israel. Despite the often exploitive relations by the Israelis of the Gazans and the Israeli military presence, it is the Palestinians of Gaza who will tell you how, since the intifadah and being cut off from Israel they have had little source of revenue.

Dr. Haider Abdel-Shafdi, a highly respected native of Gaza, who led the Palestinian delegation at the 1990 Madrid Peace Conference was recently asked what Gaza was like before the Israelis? His reply, was that it was no better, that it had always been under-developed.

Less than a week after this get-together, the Hebron massacre occurred. The reaction of the Palestinians who were to meet with the mayor was complete devastation. Future meetings were delayed because of mourning. Nevertheless, in late March, a meeting was finally arranged for May between the mayor and the Palestinians to discuss the prospects for building in East Jerusalem.

Broadway offers plenty of Jewish folk lore

By ARNOLD AGES

The late French minister of culture under Charles de Gaulle was once asked what had replaced the great tradition of French classical tragedy in France's intellectual life. He replied: "Politics."

A survey of New York City's current theatre scene suggests that there is a universal truth in that reply, but it requires some fine-tuning. Politics dominates Broadway theatrical productions this year but the tragedies, for the most part, have been replaced by comedies and musicals.

Among the 60 or so offerings along the Great White Way this season, there is moreover a cluster of comedies that revel in politics and, for want of a better word, Jewish folklore.

Jackie Mason, ever unrepentant, is now featured in a production called Politically Incorrect, a two-hour monologue in which this former rabbi and Catskills comedian delivers acerbic taunts against a variety of ethnic groups.

Mason's approach is to retail stereotypical views of the latter and to defend his caricatures by alluding constantly to the hallowed doctrine of free speech. Mason's machine-gun delivery and the sharpness of his observations ("I have no prejudice against any group as long as it belongs to the human race; that's bad enough.") are striking responsive chords among theatregoers who are packing his performances in sold-out numbers.

The redeeming feature of Mason's assault on ethnic groups is that he reserves the majority of his fusillades for Jews as he explodes the inanities of affirmative action. "Is it discrimination if there are no Jewish jockeys or hockey players?" he asks. Mason has a weighty political message to deliver but his heavily accented Yiddish-English lightens its content and makes it very palatable.

Mort Sahl's humor is light years away from Mason's but it shares a common matrix, that of the Jewish intellectual reflecting on society. In Mort Sahl's America, the man who 30 years ago was the darling of the campus scene and college lecture circuit, shows that he can still strut his stuff with a polished professionalism.

Arnold Ages

Sahl has the unusual distinction of being the classical outsider who was also an insider. Known as the quintessential liberal in the 1950s and '60s when he made his mark at San Francisco's The Hungry i, Sahl has had the unusual fate of becoming a kind of mascot of the conservative side in American politics, all the while retaining his liberal sympathies. His successful striding of these polarities has occurred because Sahl is a fearless and literate inconoclast who satirizes hypocrisy, puffery and insincerity wherever he finds it.

Where Jackie Mason uses a sledge hammer to drive home his comedy, Sahl uses gentle irony and involuted jokes. The architecture of his humor is based on surprising and unexpected turns of the phrase. "No one seems to be getting married anymore these days," he laments, "except the occasional Catholic priest."

Sahl reports that former president George Bush was confronted by a Japanese ambassador who refers to Hiroshima in an attempt to make a moral point. Bush says to the ambassador: "What has that got to do with trade negotiations?" The ambassador retorts: "We never destroyed any of your cities." Bush replies: "What about Detroit?" It should be noted that Sahl reserves some of his most mordant commentary for Jews who attempt to assimilate.

Assimilation is also the provocative theme in Wendy Wasserstein's The Sisters Rosensweig, which gets my vote for one of the best plays on the New York circuit this year. Jews who try to forget, bury or hide their past seem to be a mini-leitmotif on Broadway. The protagonist of Arthur Miller's Broken Glass, for example, is in retreat from his Jewish roots.

The main character in The Sisters Rosensweig (played magisterially by Michael Learned) is an international banker who tries to rise above her Jewish origins by aping upper-class English habits in her London home, where she is raising a rebellious teen-age daughter.

This grand design is thwarted by the daughter and by a member of an American Jewish Congress delegation, a handsome widower who is passing through the British capital. Add to this plot two more sisters, one of whom is leading a women's group trip to England (and who is always quoting her rabbi).

The ingenious plot gives playwright Wasserstein the delicious opportunity to offer some wonderfully comic observations about the Jewish conditions in this last decade of the 20th century. Wasserstein's inventive humor is a vehicle, as is the case with all great writers of comedy, for communicating bitter-sweet truths about alienation, failed marriages, spinsterhood and the trauma of growing up — all this enveloped in a particular Jewish ethos. Wasserstein may be the Jewish Chekhov of our century.

Neil Simon's vast talents as a playwright and comedy writer have made him the dean of the Broadway theatre. Many of his plays deal tangentially with Jewish themes used as context rather than as the central focus. This may also be said for his current work Laughter On The 23rd Floor, a highly original scenario in which Simon has reconstructed the ambience of the comedy writers of his youth, who are seen in a small room preparing gags for a Jewish comedian (a composite of Sid Caesar, Milton Berle and Jack Benny?) who is having some problems with his network television sponsor.

The play, set in the 1950s has the spectre of Senator Joe McCarthy and his anti-communist witch hunt pervading the atmosphere as the comedy writers exchange, during the course of the play, more than 200 jokes, puns, barbs and witticisms — all delivered with missle-like speed and often with the same explosive power.

When cultural historians of the future look back at the Broadway scene in 1994, they will undoubtedly be astonished by the pervasive Jewish input that is so dominant in the theatre.

Legionnaires' disease

Respect is a word that has been bandied about a great deal since the vote by the membership of the Canadian Legion to overturn a directive from their top brass permitting religious head coverings in Legion canteens.

Respect for those who died "for King and Country" and respect for "Canadian tradition" have been offered as reasons why heads must remain bare; in a dazzling display of logic, respect for "Western tradition" has been offered as the reason why heads may be covered with cowboy hats during the Calgary Stampede.

This bit of nastiness — particularly grating during the week in which Canadians prepared to commemorate D-Day and Jewish war veterans were honored at the National War Memorial in Ottawa — has very little to do with respect, and a great deal to do with bigotry.

Anyone who doubts that had only to listen to the arguments made during the bitter debate in Calgary. "This [his Legion branch] is my temple," one Legion member thundered. "And in my temple, they don't wear turbans!" He received enthusiastic applause.

This kind of bigotry is insidious. Supporters of the ban on religious head coverings claim that there is no prejudice involved, because anyone who is willing to follow their somewhat capricious definition of respect is welcome. The minority who refuse are "disrespectful." We are divided into "good Jews" and "bad Jews," "good Sikhs" and "bad Sikhs" — not by our definitions, but by the definitions of others.

This is bigotry. Freedom of religion means nothing if (except in matters of criminal behavior) we are free to practise only what others say we may. This is not what Canadians and their allies fought for 50 years ago.

To the Legion members who understand that those who refuse to remove turbans or kippot are, in truth, refusing to dishonor fallen comrades by dishonoring their own faith — may we drink a L'chaim together.

To the rest — we'll pass.

A hi-tech victory

The recent announcement of a ground-breaking agreement between Canada and Israel — the founding of the Canada Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF) — should be heralded as a major step for Canada into the global marketplace.

The $6 million research fund is designed to supply financing for hi-tech joint ventures between Israel and Canada. CIIRDF, a non-profit organization, will fund 50 per cent of research in areas like telecommunications, microelectronics, software, biotechnology and aviation. Two per cent of sales will go towards repaying the grant if the new product is successful. Funded by Industry Canada and the Israeli Ministry of Industry, each government has pledged $1 million in R&D funding for each of the next three years.

A win-win situation?

If this agreement is as successful as the $150-million Bi-Lateral Research and Development program (BIRD) that has operated between Israel and the United States for the past 15 years, the odds are favorable.

The immediate advantage to Canadian and Israeli firms are obvious. First, risk-sharing: those companies that enter into joint ventures under the agreement will be sharing the financial risks and any problems caused by technological setbacks. More importantly, each successful product will hit the marketplace faster than if the venture was a solo undertaking.

Israel knows full well the benefits of such deals; it has already established similar agreements with Holland, Germany and France.

Opponents to the deal will find ammunition scarce. The talk of lost employment and industry infringements do not apply as they did to the Free Trade Agreement (FTA) or the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) arguments.

The long-term benefits of the deal are more in Canada's favor than Israel's. While Canadian firms can match, and in many cases, exceed Israel's hi-tech capabilities, Canada cannot open further foreign markets to Israel. For Canadian firms, Israel will act as an international bridge.

Israel is the only nation in the world that has free trade agreements with the European Common Market (EEC) and the United States. However, the usefulness of Israel is not limited to the access it offers to these markets. International entrepreneurs will appreciate the country's strategic location relative to countries in the Pacific Ocean region. As well, with the phasing in of the peace accord, Israel will become a base for economic activity as the business potential of the Middle East is realized.

It took three years for CIIRDF to come to fruition.

It's worth noting that Israel imported $24 billion worth of goods and services last year; if Canada wants to progress and be recognized as a major player within the global economy, a free trade agreement with Israel should not take another three years.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

A typographical error in Dr. David Saul's letter in the May 26 issue left the impression that he is a survivor of the Holocaust. Dr. Saul wrote "any survivor's arm, not "my survivor's arm."

COMMISSION ON CONTINUITY

Thank you for sending Paul Lungen to report on the Canadian Commission on Jewish Identity and Continuity's national meeting on May 29.

In the article which was titled "Community mobilizes over continuity issue," there were two items that we feel require clarification.

The national commission consists of chairpeople of local commissions (of both federated and affiliated communities) together with rabbis representing Orthodox, Conservative and Reform congregations, CJF member agencies, Canadian Jewish Congress, Jewish Immigrant Aid Society and United Israel Appeal, and delegates from campus and young adult organizations, boards of Jewish education, CRB Foundation and the Canadian Zionist Federation.

A clarification is required regarding the demographic figures cited in Paul's article. Fifty thousand people identify themselves as Jews by ethnicity; however, they also indicated that they identified with a religion other than Jewish.

We look forward to future articles on the Commission's important and challenging task.

Stanley Plotnick, Chairman
Canadian Commission on Jewish Identity and Continuity

HOLINESS IN JERUSALEM

A photo caption in your Feb. 24 issue reads (in part): "Revered as a holy place, Jerusalem is also a secular city — where people live, work, eat and look for a parking space." You should know that holiness and daily living in Israel are not mutually exclusive — one does not become secular as soon as one picks up a sandwich and resume being religious once the meal is finished. The Torah focuses on how to elevate the mundane activities of life to a level of holiness. One way of elevating the mundane is, as your caption heading suggests, "to live in Jerusalem."

YIZKOR BOOKS

Re Travel Talk by Bill Gladstone, CJN, May 12:

Mr. Gladstone refers to Yizkor Collections. His comment, "The best source of Yizkor books in Canada is Toronto's Robarts Library," should be corrected. In fact, the best source for Yizkor books in Canada is to be found at the Jewish Public Library in Montreal with a collection of over 1,000 Yizkor books.

The Jewish Public Library has two copies of each of these Yizkor books, one which circulates and the other kept in our special Yizkor collection. This is a most unique and outstanding collection recognized all over the world and second only to Yivo in New York and of course Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

I think you should alert your readers to this fine collection within our own Jewish institution and to the Jewish travel guides we have in our library as well as general travel guides.

QUESTIONS CONSERVATIVE RABBIS

Re: "Report on Sex Concerns Rabbis" (May 19):

The Rabbinical Assembly's pastoral draft report cited in The CJN states that gays and lesbians are to be supported with regards to "civil equality," welcomed into congregations "as all Jews," and that "violence against gays and lesbians" is to be "deplored." Several of Toronto's Conservative rabbis have only intensified these problems by bashing homosexuals from the pulpit, remaining silent on the issue or focusing on explosive controversies. The result has been an avoidance of the real issue of basic human rights.

To my knowledge, there has not been one Conservative rabbi who has publicly supported the NDP's same-sex rights bill. By doing so, a rare positive message would be sent to gays, lesbians and bisexuals, which would be read as a welcome into Conservative congregations. It would also alleviate homophobic verbal and physical assaults.

It seems that Conservative rabbis, like most rabbis in Toronto, have chosen to vocally engage in volatile dialogues around religious same-sex unions or gay/lesbian clergy, rather than implement a policy that promotes a true sense of acceptance for gays, lesbians and bisexuals as individuals. The pastoral proposal would be a monumental step if it is even carried out once enacted.

As this avoidance of basic issues continues, gays, lesbians and bisexuals (especially the dwindling number who remain in congregations or those who are still struggling with their sexual identity) will continue to feel alienated from Judaism and the Jewish community. As well, the parents, grandparents, brothers, sisters, aunts and uncles of gays, lesbians and bisexuals will continue to be subject to the torturous ordeals of seeing one of their family members ostracized. Since part of the synagogue experience is the coming together of families, the process of marginalization of one family member expands beyond just the individual.

As Conservative rabbis continue to mechanically utter the phrase, "We accept the homosexual, not the act of homosexuality," perhaps their rhetoric can begin focusing on acceptance of the individual and how this can be achieved, rather than the condemnation of sexual acts. This is a move that even a small (very small) minority of progressive Orthodox rabbis have undertaken.

NOT FAIR TO ISRAEL

Yeshayahu Anug in his column (CJN, May 19) states "the future of the corrupt and messy Soviet Empire was as doomed as was apartheid in South Africa, as was the imposition of Israel rule over the Palestinians."

He evidently seems to have forgotten how this "imposition" came about. Never mind the fact that the combined Arab states' armies were bent strenuously on Israel's annihilation since the creation of the Jewish State, launching several wars against Israel, including the 1967 one which imposed that "imposition" on Israel.

Clumping Israel with Soviet Russia's and South Africa's apartheid regimes is tasteless and offensive.

Opinion

Germany today is not the land I used to know

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

I grew up in Germany at a time of enormous changes.

First there was World War I, which I remember vaguely. Then came the 1918 revolution, (which overthrew the Kaiser) of which I have some memory, and this was followed by the kind of inflation which I hope no one will ever see again — when the mark lost its value from one day to the next with stamps costing millions, and the only thing to do with yesterday's currency was to paper the wall in the WC with it, so you could contemplate your financial fate sorrowfully and alone.

Thereafter came the steep rise of Nazism and the accession of Hitler and our eventual emigration.

During World War II, as a chaplain with the American army, I returned to Germany, which was then hardly recognizable because of the immense destruction that had taken place. When we opened the first concentration camp, at Dora, I saw the devastation the Nazis had wrought — and in the years that followed I refused to return to the land of my birth.

But as the country changed I felt it was worth another look. Ever since, I have followed its development with great interest. The reason is simple: Germany is the very heart of Europe, and as Germany goes, so goes the continent. In addition, some 30,000 declared Jews live in the major cities, and probably again as many have not publicly acknowledged their descent.

Rabbi Plaut

The major role which Jews play in the country today is to keep alive the memory of yesterday, for their own communal development has been hesitant, unsure, and without any distinct character. What is beyond doubt, however, is the changing nature of the country itself. The Germany of today is fundamentally different from the Germany I used to know when I was young.

Then, it was a land with a homogeneous population. We Jews — 600,000 of us — did not seem to fit the perceived fabric of the nation. Though we had lived in the country for more than a thousand years we had insisted on being Jewish. We had developed the major movements which to this day govern most of Jewish religious life, from Israel to the Diaspora: from the Agudah to modern Orthodoxy, from Conservatism to Reform (Chassidism of course, had its origin in Eastern Europe, and Reconstructionism was created in the United States).

The fact that Hitler had no problem directing the unhappiness of the country toward Jews was in part due to our visibility as the only "strangers" in their own land. But no longer.

Today, the "other ones" are two and a half million Arabs and Turks, against whom the recent outrages were committed. The interesting thing is that in the last three years some 50,000 indigenous old-line Germans have become Muslims, and this number includes only those who have been registered so far. The general conviction is that there are many more, for there is no obligation to announce one's religious conviction. Thus one finds a strange sounding name like Hartmut Mohamed Herzog — a combination of German and Muslim traditions — as the chairman of the Berlin-Islamic Society of German Speaking Muslims. According to one of its spokesmen, what they like about their new religion is the absence of pastor and pope and the direct responsibility that each believer feels toward God. There is no clerical hierarchy.

I wonder how many of those who have fallen in love with this kind of relationship to the Divine are aware that Judaism has preached this for a very long time. We need rabbis as the respository of Jewish knowledge, but we do not need them to establish our relationship to God. The rabbi counts for only one in a minyan, just like anyone else.

Two and a half million Muslims in Germany — even as I write down these figures I find them hard to believe.

Kibbutzim adopt two approaches to modernization

By RUTH LACEY
World Zionist Press Service

Menachem Begin once called them "millionaires with swimming pools," but the events of 1985 changed everything for Israel's 270 kibbutzim.

Already plunged into debt in the early 80s by soaring interest rates and high inflation, they began investing in the stock market to save their shrinking shekels. The stock market crash of 1985 decimated these savings and forced many kibbutzim to re-evaluate their most basic premises. In the process, they discovered inefficiency, unprofessional management and uncontrolled spending.

With fervor for internal reform sweeping the kibbutz movement, the business of advising kibbutzim has been booming. Almost every kibbutz has turned outside for help. But two kibbutz-based consultancy groups dominate the field, each with a vastly different approach.

Vector was set up as a working branch of Kibbutz Merom Golan in the late 1980s by Yehuda Harel, after he failed in a bid to head the United Kibbutz Movement and instigate changes from above.

"We were the first company of its kind," said Harel from his Tel Aviv office. "We invented the terminology that dominates the post-debt-crisis kibbutz movement — 'change,' 'profit centres,' 'board of directors.'

"But there was always an inherent conflict in my mind — and in the company — between being a business, motivated by profit, and a purveyor of change. My view was that it was possible to be both."

Vector had a small, hand-picked team — a model of the autonomous profit-centre which is part of the Vector vision of the new kibbutz. "We were always anti-establishment, encouraging independence on every level — from the individual kibbutz to the individual kibbutznik. That was our trademark. It was the reason we attracted business."

The dozen kibbutzim with which Vector worked all instituted major changes. But none, in Harel's view, went far enough. Vector stresses the separation of kibbutz business from pure communal functions. Thus a business can concentrate on making profits and a community is free to run according to its own value system, without extraneous considerations.

The community, too, says Harel, should provide labor in return for payment, while safeguarding the rights of kibbutz workers. The community should also be a shareholder, elect a board of directors and receive dividends when there's a profit.

Some 200 kibbutzim have set up boards of directors as recommended by a consultant, 100 have established personnel departments which try to match job demands with personal preferences, and kibbutz industry is on the upswing. But, said Harel, "Until you have people lining up to be accepted to kibbutz and until kibbutz is a real social alternative, we have failed."

Vector is in fact on the verge of closing up shop.

Rafi-Ben Yosef, general secretary of Kibbutz Kadarim in the Galilee, has worked with Vector. "They tried to sell a ready-made package. Our kibbutz adopted its central premise, separating the business sector from the community, and running each sector independently. But I can't accept that any one package can suit every kibbutz. No two kibbutzim are alike."

The Institute for Organizational Consultancy is located in the heart of the United Kibbutz Movement (UKM) complex in Tel Aviv, but is independent of the UKM. Its aims are less grandiose than Vector's. "Our approach is simple and clear cut," claims institute head, Yeshiahu Gavish. "We answer specific requests — if it's converting a traditional work branch into a profit centre or giving advice about floating shares. We run seminars on specific issues from different dining room models to private car ownership." Unlike Vector, the institute takes no particular stand or responsibility for the results of its work.

Despite not having a comprehensive model, the institute does have a guiding philosophy of value-laden 'oughts.' For example, a kibbutz ought to live within its means; each work branch ought to take responsibility for its own success; and the individual ought to be given more autonomy to choose how much money he spends and on what, and more freedom to choose where he works.

"I came to the institute with my own ideas," said Ben-Yosef. "My kibbutz was interested in establishing a relationship between days worked and personal income. I asked the institute for advice about implementation and process. Yeshiahu pulled out his graphs and his surveys and tried to convince me it would fail, that we should concentrate on setting up profit centres. Personally, I'm convinced that his resistance was ideological rather than practical. I'm also convinced that at this point we need to go things alone."

Iris Levy's Tel Aviv-area kibbutz has been working with the institute for nearly three years. A large, established community, it turned to the institute at a time of deep economic crisis. The conflicts she describes illuminate the problem of defining the client and the whole question of external intervention.

"I've felt all along that the consultant we're working with is pushing an agenda. And despite the upheaval and conflict it has caused here, the institute will claim no responsibility. There is an overcentralization of power, and the profit centre's hiring and firing practices contradict even the most basic labor laws. Consultancy companies need an internal system of review. And they have to be prepared to take the blame as well as the credit for what they cause."

"We are careful to work with a committee for reform that includes kibbutznikim of all shades of opinion," counters Gavish. "There'll always be those who object, but in my eyes if the proposal is accepted democratically — it's legitimate."

Harel disagrees. "I believe that it's possible to effect change without conflict, to deal with inherent contradictions — such as the inevitable tension between freedom and equality, individual and collective — through negotiation and compromise."

The institute's piecemeal approach to reform, however, does appear to be doing better than Vector's all-encompassing one and Gavish is presently working with over 60 kibbutzim on specific projects. Profit centres abound; nearly every kibbutz has privatized some element of consumption; and most have set up pension funds for members as a way of guaranteeing personal financial security.

Nevertheless, Harel insists on having the last word: "There is a danger in not addressing the whole picture. A change is needed in the fundamental thinking of kibbutzniks — a cultural, ideological change. No one kibbutz can institute change like this alone.

But the last word belongs to sociologist Avraham Pavin of Kibbutz Ginnegar in northern Israel. In his new book on organizational consultants, he concludes that there has been a decline in kibbutzim's use of their services. "Some consultants have been dismissed, fewer are being called in and there is a tendency to restrict consultation to specific areas rather than using a global approach. All this seems to reflect the more realistic expectations of kibbutz members concerning the potential contribution of external intervention, as well as the consultants' awareness of their limited capability to effect change."

It may also mark the beginning of a new era of autonomy where kibbutzniks feel that independence ought to extend to their kibbutz's own internal processes.

Just send a cook with those groceries, please

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

I am extremely fortunate in having a supermarket that delivers. It not only delivers, it takes faxes. So, most Thursday mornings, I send it a fax. Then, as if by magic, sometime Thursday afternoon, a man appears with an invoice and bags of groceries. Bliss.

This doesn't cover all of my grocery shopping, but it covers a lot. Of course, I still plunder the big warehouse store once every couple of months and I still make weekly runs to the kosher bakery, the kosher butcher and the neighborhood all-kosher mini-mart, but my supermarket fax covers the essential basics.

My list stays on my computer and I update it, depending on what we need. It is pretty straightforward, but every now and then I wish I could order up some additions, like this:

TO: Market
FROM: Mrs. R
Please send:

3 onions (We like the sweet ones, like Georgia Vidalias. And while you are at it, please peel and chop.)
1 head garlic (You could mince those, if you would.)
1 stalk celery (Clean, chop.)
1 bunch parsley (Clean, chop.)
2 leeks (Clean and slice in rounds.)
6 large potatoes (Peel and cube.)
1 pkg. onion soup mix (Dissolve in boiling water, add all above. Simmer two hours and salt to taste.)
1 box brown sugar
1 pint of strawberries (Just wash them, hull them, throw out the mushy ones and sprinkle with ¼ cup brown sugar.)
3 cucumbers (Peel, dice.)
3 tomatoes (Seed, dice.)
1 purple onion (Peel, mince.)
2 green peppers (Trim, dice. Toss them with cukes, tomatoes, onion, olive oil, lemon juice, salt and pepper. You'd save me a world of time.)
3 boxes frosted cookies
3 9-carton packages of 8 oz. boxed apple juices
2 loaves sandwich white bread
1 jar peanut butter (Please select a kosher brand with no sugar, no fat, no salt, no peanuts.)
1 bag of apples (Wash. Buff.)
1 bunch carrots (Peeled, cut into sticks.)
1 package brown paper lunch bags
1 package sandwich bags (Put 4 carrot sticks each in plastic sandwich bags. Now make 15 sandwiches of the bread and peanut butter. Remember, child number one wants the crusts off, child number two wants the sandwich quartered, and child number three won't eat anything anyway. Place each sandwich in a plastic bag. Put in paper bag, and add a box of juice, an apple, carrot sticks, and a cookie — wrapped. Whew, that's lunches for a week. Thanks.)
1 large can coffee (Just perk it and give me a wake up call because I know I'm dreaming.) Imagine, having groceries arrive already prepared. What fantasy could be more unlikely?

Erica Meyer Rauzin

Actually, there are people we encounter every day who get their groceries already chopped, sorted, packed, and cooked: small children.

However, this miracle, like youth itself, is wasted on people who do not appreciate it at all. They pick, they complain, they are as idiosyncratic as movie stars. My kids do cook, now and then, mostly desserts, but they cook when, where, what and how they want to, without concern for the fiscal, environmental or nutritional impact.

I just hope that when I'm 80 and they are struggling to prepare their own humble repasts — confronted with mountains of produce that is not yet peeled, washed, sliced, diced or mashed — one sibling will look at another and admit, "You know, Mom was a pretty good cook, after all."

And I'll smile, as I watch them work, and then PB make them bring me another plateful.

Denying the undeniable

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Denying the undeniable is the stock-in-trade of a new and growing breed of anti-Semites — Holocaust deniers.

These propagandists, whose range of sophistication varies, claim that the "myth" of the Holocaust enabled Jews to "steal" a fortune in reparations from Germany and to displace the Palestinians in the creation of Israel.

But denial, writes Deborah Lipstadt in Denying the Holocaust (The Free Press, $22.95 U.S.), a comprehensive and lucid account of this phenomenon, is not just an assault on a central event in Jewish history. More than that, "it poses a threat to all those who believe that knowledge and memory are among the keystones of our civilization."

Employing a strategy of deceit and distortion, these malevolent scribblers have, to some extent, succeeded in winning converts. In a recent survey, 25 percent of American high school students said they thought it was possible that the Holocaust never occurred. In Brazil, a book denying the Holocaust posted sales of 200,000 copies.

Lipstadt, a professor of history at Emory University, warns that the falsifiers may score yet more points in the future. As time passes and fewer Holocaust survivors can personally challenge their assertions, their campaigns will only grow in intensity. As she puts it: "Their objective is to plant seeds of doubt that will bear fruit in coming years, when there are no more survivors or eyewitnesses alive to attest to the truth."

At its core, Holocaust denial is not only a manifestation of age-old animus toward Jews. It is an attempt to rehabilitate fascism. As long as that ideology is inextricably linked with Nazism and its offspring, the Final Solution, its appeal will be strictly limited. But if the Holocaust can be separated from fascism, its chances of being resuscitated are vastly improved.

One of its earliest proponents, a French fascist named Maurice Bardeche, claimed that some of the evidence regarding the concentration camps had been falsified, and that the deaths there had been primarily the result of war-related privations.

His bedfellow, Paul Rassinier, a former Communist who had been interned in two concentration camps, claimed that the Holocaust "myth" was concocted by Jews in order to "make Germany an ever-lasting milk cow for Israel."

In the United States, Harry Elmer Barnes was one of the first major deniers. A history professor, he claimed that Allied atrocities surpassed those of Nazi Germany.

Austin App, a professor of English, became one of its chief ideologues. Going much further than Barnes, he asserted that the figure of six million was "a bloated libel" and a "smear terrorizing myth." He also said that there was not a "single document, order or blue-print" that proved the Nazis intended to exterminate the Jews.

App's magnum opus, The Six Million Swindle: Blackmailing the German People for Hard Marks with Fabricated Corpses, published in 1973, claimed that the Holocaust "hoax" was a plot jointly inspired and nurtured by Communists and Jews.

App's themes were eagerly picked up by a panoply of deniers, from Robert Faurisson in France to Bradley Smith in the United States:

- Emigration, not annihilation, was Nazi Germany's plan for solving the "Jewish problem."
- The majority of Jews who supposedly died in German captivity were actually subversives, spies, saboteurs and criminals.
- Gas chambers never existed, and the gassing installations found in Auschwitz were really crematoria for cremating Jews who had died from a variety of causes.

Lipstadt pays considerable attention to Arthur Butz, whose 1977 book, The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, is one of the classics of denial. In her estimation, what differentiates Butz — a professor of electrical engineering in Illinois — from his predecessors is the veneer of scholarship and the impression of seriousness and objectivity he conveys.

Cleverly, he does not whitewash Nazi crimes, and concedes that as many as a million Jews may have died at the hands of the Nazis. But on closer examination, Butz is just another denier. Claiming that the Holocaust is basically a hoax, he declared that the Germans and the Austrians have been the real victims of World War II.

Jews, he wrote, manipulate governments, control war crimes trials, govern the media and determine other nations' foreign policy, all in the name of furthering "Zionist ends." Amazingly enough, Butz claims that the Holocaust is perpetuated by forged documents.

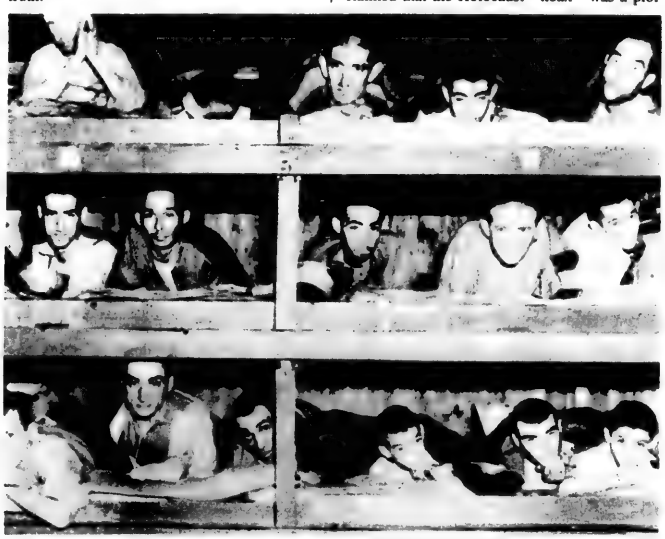
Lipstadt devotes a chapter to the Los Angeles-based Institute for Historical Review, with which Butz and his ilk are associated. Its main supporter, Willis Carto, has been described by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith as the most important and powerful professional anti-Semite in the United States. Carto is the founder of the Liberty Lobby and maintains close links with the hate-spewing Noontide Press.

Lipstadt demolishes the credentials of Fred Leuchter, the author of The Leuchter Report: An Engineering Report on the Alleged Execution Gas Chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau, and Majdanek, Poland, which was commissioned by Toronto denier Ernst Zundel. She demonstrates, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that Leuchter is a fraud whose testimony at Zundel's trial was rejected as "gross speculation."

Clearly, deniers are purveyors of outright, malicious lies. For years, they questioned the authenticity of the diary of Anne Frank. For many readers, it is often their introduction to the Holocaust. In response to the litany of attacks, the Netherlands State Institute for War Documentation subjected the original diary to a battery of rigorous scientific tests.

The final report vindicated the diary and, thereby, made asses of the deniers. The paper, glue, fibers in the binding and ink were judged to be in use in the 1940s, when the diary was written. Once again, the deniers' claims had no relationship to the most elementary rules of truth and evidence.

So what else is new?



Holocaust survivors immediately after World War II.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

It sounds innocuous enough, but in reality, it's a Trojan Horse used to further the nefarious cause of Holocaust denial.

The Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust, headed by Bradley Smith, has set its sights on American university campuses.

In the past few years, Smith has placed paid ads in campus newspapers to proclaim that infectious diseases claimed the lives of most Jews during the Holocaust; that the gas chambers, if they existed, were used only as "life-saving" fumigation chambers to prevent disease and delouse clothing; and that several hundred thousand rather than six million Jews perished during the war, the victims of Allied bombings.

Bradley's camera-ready polemics have been accepted by about 20 newspapers at universities ranging from Rutgers and Duke to Cornell and Notre Dame. Twelve newspapers, including those at Yale and Harvard, have refused to print the ads.

Bradley, a 64-year-old former construction worker from Visalia, California, claims that he is not an anti-Semite and that he is solely motivated by intellectual honesty and the pursuit of historical truth.

Claiming he is defending the American ideal of the First Amendment, which sanctifies free speech, Bradley argues that "Stalinist Jews" fabricated the story of the Holocaust "to legitimate" the Soviet occupation of Eastern Europe after World War II.

Campuses targetted by Holocaust deniers

According to Bradley, the United States and Britain used the Holocaust to stifle debate about the crimes they committed against German and Japanese civilians during the war.

And furthermore, he alleges, Zionists appropriated the Holocaust to justify their "invasion" of Palestine and their demand for U.S. aid to Israel.

Bradley, who never attended university, says he is simply trying to generate an open debate that historians have avoided because they fear the wrath of "organized Jewry."

As he put it in an interview: "I'm looking for an audience and I'm not looking for a bunch of middle-age professors who have betrayed the standards of their own universities. I'm looking for young people who aren't carrying the baggage of 50 years of the state-supported line and still have the remnant of an open mind."

Although he fancies himself as an independent crusader whose only desire is to correct falsehoods, Bradley's real agenda is readily apparent.

Bradley and like-minded propagandists want to distance themselves from blatant anti-Semites and thus portray themselves as respectable bearers of the unadorned truth. By doing so, they hope to reach, and convert, more Americans.

The stakes are high. If Bradley and company succeed, even partially, they may achieve their foremost objective — diluting, if not eradicating, the impact of Hitler's genocidal policies.

Bradley has been involved in Holocaust denial for about the past 15 years, ever since he read Robert Faurisson's article "The Problem of the Gas Chambers or the Rumor of Auschwitz." Faurisson, a French academic, is one of the chief theorists of Holocaust denial, as well as an associate of Ernst Zundel, the German neo-Nazi who lives in Toronto.

Inspired by Faurisson's rantings, Bradley started a newsletter called Prima Facie, which he dedicated to "monitoring Holocaust cultism, censorship and suppression of free inquiry." He founded the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust in 1987, a year after his first campus newspaper ad was rejected by the Daily Nebraskan at the University of Nebraska.

Ironically, some of the campus editors who've published Bradley's broadsides have been Jewish.

In December 1993, students at Brandeis University destroyed thousands of copies of The Justice after editor Howard Jeruchimowitz printed an ad entitled A Revisionist's View of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Earlier this year, Andrew Wallenstein, who edits QC Quad at Queens College in New York, came under fire for running the same ad.

Like it or not, Bradley is making inroads into respectability. His devious message may be getting through.

Survey of monuments published

By RUTH GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Service

A New York-based monuments preservation organization has published a survey of historic Jewish monuments in Poland — the first full-scale survey of existing Jewish relics in contemporary Poland.

Including much previously unavailable or unknown information, the survey describes the current condition and status of more than 1,000 Jewish sites throughout Poland, mostly cemeteries and synagogues.

The illustrated survey is a report of research carried out between 1991 and 1993 by the Jewish Heritage Council of the World Monuments Fund on behalf of the United States Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad.

The commission, founded by Congress in 1985 to work with the U.S. State Department, negotiates agreements for the inventory and preservation of endangered monuments, historic buildings, archival material and cemeteries associated with the foreign heritage of American citizens.

The survey of Poland, whose published report is the first in a planned series funded by the commission and focusing on Central and Eastern Europe, was undertaken to encourage government and private strategies to protect and preserve these relics.

"This report should remind government and private citizens that preservation and restoration of Eastern and Central European cultural landmarks is of the utmost importance to many Americans," said Rabbi Arthur Schneier, the commission's chairman.

1,000 Jewish sites throughout Poland are described

The survey includes a listing of all the approximately 300 known extant synagogue buildings in Poland, their dates of construction (if known), and present use.

The synagogues range from ruins, to buildings now used as cinemas, warehouses, shops, cultural centers, museums and other secular uses, to a handful still used as synagogues.

The survey also lists approximately 700 of the 1,000 Jewish cemeteries or sites of former cemeteries identified during the survey, with information including number of tombstones, condition, present use, and threats from vegetation, pollution, erosion, vandals and construction. Many of the cemeteries listed have no visible tombstones.

Information about these sites has been installed in a computer database at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

"Of the once vast number of cemeteries, synagogues, communal buildings and other significant sites associated with the distinctive cultural and spiritual center of Judaism in Poland — arguably the most important of its kind in Europe — only a small number exist today," the survey states.

"Most are not recognizable for what they once were. The Nazi destruction of Jewish buildings and cemeteries with the goal of eradicating every trace of Jewish existence was followed by half a century of neglect of most of the places that managed to survive. Despite recent profound and welcome change, an enormous task lies ahead to halt and reverse deterioration, and to correct the effects of mindless and inappropriate change," it says.

The survey also includes chapters on the historical background of Jewish heritage in Poland and a discussion of Poland's historic preservation law and its application vis-a-vis Jewish historic sites.

Winnipeg skinheads join anti-racism rally

'Attack on pride'

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — An anti-racist skinhead participated in a multicultural rally against racism in Winnipeg, despite a death threat from a Neo-Nazi group of Northern Hammerskins that are trying to establish a foothold in the city.

"I felt the threat made it even more important for me to be here," said Denise, a teacher of Aboriginal origin. "Racism isn't just an attack on others' cultures and religions. It is also an attack on pride. We have to educate people to have pride in ourselves."

These skinheads are typical of a number of groups who, while they shave their heads and wear the traditional garb associated with the name, are in fact anti-racist, unlike the majority of their counterparts.

Denise was one of four young members of the recently formed United Against Racism Collective (UARC), made up of skinheads and other youth against racial prejudice, and several other speakers from Winnipeg's ethnic and labor communities who addressed the crowd of about 150 on May 26 in front of Manitoba's Legislature, to protest the presence of Northern Hammerskins in the city.

A second UARC member named Jen explained that the true skinhead culture is a combination of Jamaican and British working class cultures which means that true skinheads can't be racist.

"Bear," a third skinhead, stated that UARC is open to all young people who are anti-racist, whether or not they share the skinhead philosophy.

The fourth UARC speaker, who identified himself as Yaron Walter, reported that he was a founding member of the group and that he is the grandson of Jewish Holocaust survivors. "We advocate a non-violent aproach to confronting racists," he said. "We believe in strength of numbers."

The rally was organized by the Manitoba Coalition Against Racism and Apartheid (MCARA) and it was MCARA's leader, Helmut-Harry Loewen who first reported the Hammerskin death threat against Denise. He also noted that some Northern Hammerskins were driving around the Legislature just before the rally. He praised UARC members for their courage in fighting at the ground level and encouraged everyone to support their efforts.

Loewen sounded the alarm about a racist rally organized by Wolfgang Droege's Heritage Front and scheduled for Metcalfe, Ontario, just outside Ottawa, on May 29. He described the worldwide network of hate groups and called upon Winnipeg to put a dent in that network.

Michael Lazar, chair of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, Midwestern region, also referred to the "Aryan Summit" in Metcalfe. He compared Canada's racists with Hitler and the Nazis' early days when they too were dismissed by many as a lunatic fringe. He said the goal of groups such as the Northern Hammerskins and the Aryan Nation is to destroy Canada as we know it and urged his audience to fight back with education, tolerance and understanding.

"We will soon be commemorating the 50th anniversary of D-Day, the Normandy landing," he said. "Our soldiers fought to liberate the world from Nazism. We must continue to fight against evil, intolerance and inhumanity."

Grade 11 student Melissa Hyman described her experiences as a participant on The March of the Living. "Evil triumphs when good people sit back and do nothing," she said. "We all must take action against the evil in the world today. There is no such thing as an innocent bystander."

The Master of Ceremonies for the rally was Black activist Wade "Kojo" Williams. He and speakers Jim Bear of the Aboriginal Council of Winnipeg and Dr. Ahmod Randeree, formerly the representative in Winnipeg of the African National Council, spoke not only of blatant racist but of the more subtle systematic racism that pervades Canadian society.

"We need to redouble our efforts," he said "and tackle racism in Manitoba on all fronts."

Ontario PC leader lauds Israel's economic growth

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mike Harris says he felt more secure in downtown Jerusalem on a recent visit to Israel than he does in some cities in Ontario.

The leader of the Ontario Progressive Conservative (PC) Party said he found an atmosphere of economic growth and confidence in Israel that he says is missing in his own province.

Speaking under a banner reading: Israel Bonds — A Strong Economy for a Strong Israel, Harris praised the work of Israel Bonds and urged the 450 people at a luncheon at the Sheraton Hotel to invest in them.

The luncheon was sponsored by the Construction and Development Division of State of Israel Bonds and featured Harris' reminiscences of his trip to the northern border regions, to the West Bank, his stay at a kibbutz, the "miracle" of the Jordan valley, and the emotions he and his family felt on visiting Yad Vashem. At all times, he said, he felt "secure" among the people of Israel.

As a result of his four-day visit, Harris now understands the intricacies and difficulties of the peace process, Dror Zeigerman, Israel's consul general, said. "He understands the determination of the Jewish people that Jerusalem will be the capital of Israel."

The consul general said of the accord: "We are doing it for ourselves, not the world."

Presented with a State of Israel Bond, Harris signed it over to Yad Vashem of Canada, which sponsored his trip to Rome and Israel, and of which he is a board member.

Just before the PC leader spoke, co-chair Eli Shvili announced that as of May 31 the interest rate on the Canadian Floating Rate Issue Bond is 6 per cent, up from 4.75 per cent. "I've only been here half an hour and look what I've done," joked Harris.

Co-chair Mark Freedman reminded the audience that State of Israel Bonds are now approved for investment in RRSPs.

On his way from Tel Aviv to the airport, Harris said he was amazed to see 10 or 20 construction cranes out one window of his cab, and another 10 to 20 out the window on the other side. "That's a sign of confidence and growth, something we have't got here in Ontario. You would have to go up pretty high in the air to spot 10 construction cranes in Toronto."

Bemoaning the lack of investor confidence in Ontario under an NDP government, Harris declared, "Here in Ontario, we roll out the red tape, not the red carpet. If you can figure out a way to make a buck, we'll figure out how to get it away from you."

Launching an unofficial start to his campaign for the provincial election, expected in 1995, Harris promised to create 725,000 new jobs in the private sector, repeal Bill 40 which places restrictions on strike-bound operations, to cut provincial income taxes by 30 per cent, cut Workers' Compensation Board fees by five per cent, freeze Hydro rates for five years, and scrap payroll health taxes on small business.

He also pledged to fully balance the Ontario budget, to cut the number of MPPs in the Ontario legislature from 130 to 99, a 15 per cent reduction in the number of bureaucrats, to cut tax-free allowances and pensions of MPPs, and pledged a saving of $450 million by eliminating "educrats," whom he described as people outside the classroom.

As part of his "common sense revolution," the PC leader said he would cut $6 billion from spending. His five-point plan has come up with means of securing $5½ billion in savings, and he appealed to his audience to come up with ideas for the rest.

Harris told a questioner he would scrap the social contract of Premier Bob Rae, but not the savings. "We're not throwing the money back into the pot." In answer to another question, he said he believed one tax should replace the GST and PST, and "I'll fight vigorously to lower the rate."

Three members of the PC caucus at Queens Park, Charles Harnick, Cam Jackson and David Turnbull, were introduced.

Jules Kronis, general counsel for State of Israel Bonds, did the Hamotzi, while co-chair Freddy Guth thanked the speaker. Others at the head table were Charles Diamond, Barry Feiner, Alex Grossman and Larry Waller.

Who will pay for the Thibaudeau decision? (third of three parts)

In previous issues I've examined the reasons for the recent Federal Court of Appeal ruling that Mrs. Thibaudeau, a single mother receiving child support payments, did not have to pay taxes on them. If the case is upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada or if the federal government moves to eliminate an ex-husband's ability to deduct such payments from his taxable income, then the Gates of fiscal Hell could open. The ex-husband may then be able to claim a serious "material change" in financial circumstances that could trigger lower support payments. First, the ex-wife would have more disposable income. Second, the ex-husband would lose his ability to deduct.

Accordingly, whether or not this "double whammy" effect occurs, ex-husbands may now attempt to renegotiate and relitigate their support agreements. Conversely, women who will suddenly benefit may find themselves in Court to defend the current payments they are receiving. If "push comes to shove", women will be arguing various defenses. I have no doubt that many will argue that expenses have increased in excess of the original "gross-up" calculated for taxes since the original calculation was made. Others will claim that the original amount awarded was far too low.

Mothers are highly unlikely to agree to have their payments reduced. And in many cases, ex-husbands will not wish to continue to pay as much if the Courts could lower their payments, particularly if the deduction will be taken away from them. The result could be a flood of defended lawsuits which will swamp our already overburdened family law courts and legal aid programs, considerably beyond their distended limits. Women who are awaiting court dates to determine child support payments for the first time could be waiting a lot longer if the caseloads of the courts increase. (In the Newmarket motions Court I recently was attending on one of sixty-four cases listed for a hearing by a single judge, all in one day. Needless to say, most of the cases were adjourned by the Court to another day. When I returned a week later, there was another lengthy caseload and I was not much further ahead. This is not an unusual scenario given the current budgetary restrictions of the Ontario government).

Since custody/access disputes are often interconnected with support disputes, this decision may create a potentially chaotic situation that could lead to a partial breakdown of the family court system. It reminds me of the Isaac Asimov story in which he depicts the logistical nightmare of returning property to millions of souls when Moshiach (the Messiah) comes and the dead return to the world of the living.

Every child support agreement or Order made in which taxes were taken into consideration could now be open to renegotiation and litigation as a result of Thibaudeau. The Federal and Provincial governments must immediately address these practical issues.

For the moment, advising my clients and former clients will be quite difficult since the rules have disappeared overnight and there's a great deal of money involved!

Israeli journalist calls Syria key to peace in Middle East

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Syria is the key to peace in the Middle East, an Israeli journalist said here recently at a meeting sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee and other groups and attended by a large crowd at Holy Blossom Temple.

"This year there can be peace with Syria," said Akiva Eldar, chief of the Washington Bureau of the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz.

"Syria will bring along the other Arab countries," he said. "The ultimate dream of Israelis is to stop for lunch in Damascus on a motor trip."

This year offers a "window of opportunity" for Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to reach a deal with Syria over the Golan Heights, Eldar said. "In two years there will be an election, and in the year of an election you don't offer concessions." He added that he does not believe Rabin is ready to announce a deal yet.

One audience member objected strongly to Eldar's description of PLO chairman Yassar Arafat as a "clown who could not be trusted."

The questioner, who opposed the accord with the PLO, said Arafat "is a brilliant leader, not a clown. Fifty years ago someone else was being described as a clown. That clown killed one-third of our people. I have the sense that this meeting is like a meeting in Poland before the war. I see the decline of Israel." Scattered applause greeted the last statement.

In response, Eldar asked the questioner, "Are you willing to transfer the Arab population?" "Absolutely," was the reply. "Then I rest my case," the journalist said.

Eldar, who covered the peace talks in Madrid and the signing in Washington, said there is no desire by the Rabin government "to rush to settle the Jerusalem issue," though ultimately it will be Israel's responsibility.

Jews should be able to continue to live in Hebron, he said. "I don't believe in apartheid and I don't want Israel to be the last country practicing apartheid."

He said he was in favor of "territorial concessions" and opposed to a multinational society in Israel. "Israel is not Bosnia."

At the outset, Eldar said a recent poll in the United States showed 88 per cent of Jewish people support the accord with the PLO. He asked who in the audience supported it, and when a considerable number raised their hands, said "that's very impressive. Sometimes you can trust the pollsters."

Eldar himself supports the accord. "We did it because it is in our (Israel's) interests, not out of love or trust." Israel will benefit from this "new strategy of peace," he predicted, stating that it has already resulted in President Hafez Al-Assad of Syria paying his first visit to Cairo.

Though the territories were once considered a "bargaining chip" they have turned into a "liability" for Israel, he said. "Too many people who want the accord to fail have access to weapons."

Donald Carr, vice-chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, chaired the meeting while David Rotenberg, chair of the Ontario region Israel Affairs Committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress, thanked the speaker.

Other groups sponsoring the meeting were Holy Blossom Temple, B'nai Brith Canada's central region Israel Affairs Committee, Canadian Zionist Federation and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Federation honors volunteer

TORONTO — The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is bestowing a new honor on veteran volunteer Judy Gwartz.

She is this year's winner of the Ben Sadowski Award for extended, extensive and distinguished community service. She has already received the federation's Leadership Development Award.

Gwartz currently chairs the federation's Human Resources department. She was a former chair of the UJA Women's Campaign; the Holocaust Remembrance Committee's Anne Frank Exhibit; the Women's Advisory Committee of the Bequest and Endowment Fund; and the Jewish Information Service Advisory Committee. She was also founding president of the Jewish Women's Federation.

Gwartz also has been associated with Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Centre and the United Way. She is a University of Toronto graduate who enjoys skiing, tennis and classical music.

Metro police make arrest following 'sexual assault' near Jewish school

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A 35-year-old man was charged with sexual assault last week in regard to an incident near the Viewmount branch of Eitz Chaim Day School, just off school property, on May 26.

The incident falls into one of the least physically intrusive categories of sexual assault, a term which defines a range of offences including sexual gestures and unwanted touching, as well as sexual intercourse.

Shortly after classes were dismissed for the day, a man approached a junior high school student, told her he loved her and kissed her head, which she had covered with her coat. The student was with three friends who witnessed the occurrence.

A staff member at the Orthodox school called police when the girl and two of her friends ran back into the building. With the help of a detailed description, police proceeded to identify and arrest a man who lives in the neighborhood of the school (Viewmount Avenue and Bathurst Street).

The girl was not hurt, said Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, the general studies principal. He noted that no violence was involved in the incident.

The arrested man is currently in custody, undergoing psychiatric assessment, and is scheduled to appear in court on June 30 for a hearing to determine his fitness to stand trial.

A few days before the incident Eitz Chaim had sent parents a streetproofing questionnaire supplied by the Metropolitan Toronto Police to raise awareness of street safety issues. The questionnaire included questions such as, "Have you ever discussed with your child what abnormal behavior is?" and "Does your child know when to reject adult authority?"

Rabbi Jakobovits noted that he has an "enormous" file of safety notices which have been sent home with students, and that police officers have visited the school on a number of occasions to educate students about safety.

Following the incident, a short notice on street safety was included in a list of announcements sent home to parents. It read in part, "The incident imparts additional emphasis to the importance of street-proofing your sons and daughters — all ages. There is always the possibility, at all locations, of more severe threats. The school will of course continue its long-term vigilance, and its various safety programs, and constant liaison with the relevant government safety and law-enforcement agencies."

It was also noted that the arrested man is "known to be . . . somewhat disadvantaged."

Tel-Aide reaches out to help gay, lebsian and bisexual Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a young teenager living in Winnipeg's close-knit Jewish community a decade ago, Jana felt isolated. She thought no one in the community was like her, and had nightmares for months about family, friends and acquaintances discovering she was a lesbian.

Jana, along with three other panelists, spoke recently at a meeting of Tel-Aide, the Jewish Distress Line, to help sensitize and inform the volunteers who answer the phones about issues concerning gay, lesbian and bisexual Jews.

Also participating in the discussion were gay male students Mitchel and Lawrence, co-founders of York University's Coalition for Jewish Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Students, and Bernie, the father of a lesbian daughter.

Tel-Aide began in 1985. Trained Jewish volunteers now field almost 3,000 calls a year from people who are lonely, depressed, angry, confused or stressed. Among the callers have been a number of young people unsure of their sexuality, said Tel-Aide chair Bonnie Kates.

To keep up to date, Tel-Aide volunteers meet with experts in other fields such as geriatric psychiatry, Kates told The CJN.

Jana admitted that it probably would never have occurred to her to call a Jewish distress line "because I had no idea you were sensitive to this issue."

Most people seeking help look within their own community first, believes Mitchel, who is studying gay literature and gay theory as a graduate student.

Mitchel said future copies of the Coalition's literature will include the Tel-Aide number. "People [should] know the volunteer will be sympathetic, understanding and informed."

Mitchel noted the wide variety of resources available to the Jewish gay community in Toronto: the Jewish Support Group for Families and Friends of Gays and Lesbians, which meets monthly at Holy Blossom Temple; Congregation Keshet Shalom, a gay/lesbian synagogue; the Jewish Queer Culture Committee; Holy Blossom's Jewish AIDS Assist program (which is for anyone affected by AIDS); Jewish Bisexual Lesbian Feminist Discussion (Nice Jewish Girls); and the Jewish Feminist Anti-Fascist League, a political action group.

An extensive index of Jewish gay/lesbian archival material is available at the Ontario Jewish Archives, noted Mitchel, adding that the gay/lesbian Glad Day Bookshop has an excellent selection of Jewish gay and lesbian literature.

"I hope attitudes will change toward gays and lesbians," Jana told the volunteers. Her own feelings as a young teenager mirrored attitudes she encountered among the people she knew. "It was hard for me to call myself lesbian because of the negative stereotypes which I didn't perceive as applying to me," she recalled.

A gay male friend of hers wondered how he could be gay and still be Jewish, Jana said. When she cofounded a Winnipeg group for Jewish gays and lesbians, she was stunned to see 16 people at the first meeting.

"I realized 'I'm not the only Jewish lesbian,' and I started to accept myself."

Parents of gays and lesbians also need to know they're not alone. "If someone had said to us, 'That's a common situation,' our road to recovery, or whatever you want to call it, would have been a heck of a lot faster," said Bernie, whose lesbian daughter came out to him and his wife in the late 1980s.

"If I had heard in The CJN about a Jewish support group, it would have been wonderful." (At that time there were no Jewish support groups for parents of gays and lesbians, and Bernie and his wife were among the first members of the Holy Blossom group.)

"We were quite devastated," Bernie recalled. He noted, though, that coming out was beneficial for his daughter. "A tremendous weight had lifted off her shoulders. She no longer had to live a lie."

What's important to Bernie, he emphasized, "is that my daughter's happy, that she has someone who cares about her and who she cares about, [although] I wouldn't have been able to say this the first week."

Lawrence, who, like Mitchel is a graduate of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), was involved with York University's Jewish Student Federation (JSF) for four years before he felt ready to start dealing with being gay, he said.

When he first attended the campus gay/lesbian support group, he discovered that over half the people there were Jewish.

"This is crazy," he remembered thinking. "Why is everybody denying their Jewish identity and just focusing on their gay/lesbian identity?"

Lawrence, Mitchel and one other student proposed and organized the Coalition as a JSF committee, and it continues to run a weekly support group for young people in their teens and 20s. Each support group meeting is facilitated by a social worker from Jewish Family & Child Services.

To contact Tel-Aide, call 636-9610. Hours are Monday to Thursday 9:30 a.m. to 10 p.m., Fridays 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. and occasional Sundays. Volunteers are available to discuss issues and/or provide information.

Gay/lesbian community centres in large cities across Canada should also be able to provide information on local chapters of Jewish lesbian and gay groups.

Same-sex bill divides rabbis

"Like most communities, Jews are deeply divided on the issue of paying the equivalent of spousal benefits to gays and lesbians, and not just by whether they are Orthodox, Conservative, Reform or unaffiliated," the statement said. "Within every synagogue and perhaps within most families, there are thoughtful persons whose spiritual values lead them to different conclusions."

Rabbi Zeplowitz told The CJN both he and Rabbi Bielfeld attended the news conference not as rabbis but "as individual Jews," and also as members of a movement whose parent body, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, last year issued resolutions calling on the United States and Canada to extend same-sex spousal benefits.

Rabbi Zeplowitz said he feels "very strongly" that the bill would not grant additional rights but simply extend rights to individuals who have been "excluded."

The Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR), which represents Reform, Reconstructionist and Conservative rabbis, has not issued a statement on the bill because there has been "so much difference of opinion" among members, says board president Rabbi Wayne Allen.

Any statement now from the TBR "would be more divisive than helpful," Rabbi Allen added.

Toronto's Vaad Harabonim, representing the city's Orthodox rabbis, did issue a statement, signed by Rabbi Moshe Stern, urging all provincial legislators to defeat the bill.

"The government must not allow itself to be intimidated by a vocal minority and must act in a responsible way that upholds time-honored traditions that lend stability and dignity to our lives.

"This bill, if approved, will add legitimacy and sanction unnatural same-sex relationships, which will further erode the social structure of our society and which violate basic biblical injunctions [which] prohibit a homosexual lifestyle," the Vaad's statement said.

Earlier, Rabbi Stern told The CJN the Vaad "is encouraged that members of the local Conservative rabbinate saw fit to disassociate themselves from the [recent] proposals of the Rabbinical Assembly's Commission on Human Sexuality..., which regards homosexuality as fulfilling some sort of will of G-d.

"We hope that the entire Rabbinical Assembly convention will reject this proposal, for all it does is legitimize lifestyles that are contrary to Torah law and Jewish tradition."

Speaking, he stressed, not on behalf of the TBR but as an individual, Rabbi Allen said the bill is "pretty much a dicey issue. No one is in favor of condoning violence [against homosexuals]."

On the other hand, "we as Jews look to marriage and procreation to replenish our ranks. It's anomalous for us to look at relationships from which children would not [naturally] result.

"We believe the relationship between a husband and wife is a different calibre [than a homosexual relationship]. And if the intent of this bill is to [sanction] ceremonies of commitment, then that's something that would give us serious concern."

Rabbi Allen added that he has received a letter from Congregation Keshet Shalom, Toronto's synagogue for gay and lesbian Jews, asking rabbis to support the bill.

"That's something in good conscience I cannot do," he said.

No one from Congregation Keshet Shalom returned The CJN's calls.

Just last month, the Rabbinical Assembly, the umbrella organization for Conservative rabbis, issued a controversial and much-resisted draft pastoral letter on human sexuality (to which the Vaad Harabonim's statement refers).

The draft, expected to come under much revision, reaffirmed the movement's traditional support for heterosexuality but reiterated that as Jews, gay men and lesbians are welcome as members in Conservative congregations.

In 1990, Conservative rabbis passed a resolution that endorsed full civil equality for gays and lesbians.

The whole issue of homosexuality has caused a split between American Conservative leaders and their more traditional Canadian counterparts.

Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker of Congregation Darchei Noam, Toronto's only Reconstructionist synagogue, told The CJN his movement is on record as advocating complete equality of all people, both in civil terms and in synagogue life.

Senior Care launches apartment building

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some lucky Jewish seniors (age 59 plus) have a chance to get low-rental apartments with George Brown College, Casa Loma and the posh Casa Hill houses as their neighbors.

The sod was turned May 31 for the 59-unit, $6.5-million, low-income geared Habayit Shelanu (Our Home) sponsored by Senior Care, with occupancy a year from now.

There is a waiting list of 40 already for Habayit Shelanu but officials are not discouraging applications (call Arnold Foss at Senior Care, 635-2860).

Motorists speeding by will have trouble spotting the lot on Kendall Avenue just south of Davenport Road where the 5½-storey building will rise.

It is now a small parking lot, but its location is in the big leagues. Besides benefiting from the amenities of the college nearby and its health-care services for seniors, residents will overlook the luxurious Casa Villa row houses, some of which have their own private elevators. The subway is a short walk away.

Eighty per cent of the apartments will be subsidized, and 20 per cent will be rented at market value. The building includes 45 one-bedroom units, five bachelor units with a small bedroom, five two-bedroom units and four barrier free (wheelchair accessible) spaces.

Single people, couples and two people living together will be eligible, and couples with a note from their doctor stating a second bedroom is necessary will be considered for the larger aparments.

"The project will be a home for persons primarily in their 70s and 80s faced with coping with some degree of reduced mobility, agility, vision or hearing," said Dr. Les Richmond, president of Habayit Shelanu, at the sod-turning.

Prospective tenants will be those already aging-in-place in the comunity, Richmond said. A full range of support services will be made available for those who require assistance. There will be no doctor or nurse on the premises, but there will be 24-hour supervision with in-house staff.

Richmond thanked the Kehilla Residential program for its assistance.

Among those at the sod-turning were George Brown College chair David Pratley, Angela Eliosof, David Herlick, Larry Schwartz and Maurice Rotfarb of the Habayit Shelanu Board of Directors, Michael Scheinert, executive director of Senior Care, Arnold Foss, project co-ordinator and architects Jerome Markson and Ernie Hodgson.

Ethiopian law student has big dreams in Israel

HAIFA — At 24, Dasa Itzik has already overcome one of the biggest obstacles standing in the way of his dream.

Itzik, a first-year law student at the University of Haifa, is the first Ethiopian to enter an Israeli law school.

In Ethiopia, Itzik wanted to be a rabbi like his father, but changed his mind after making aliyah 10 years ago. He journeyed from Ethiopia to Sudan on foot in order to join his parents, who had gone on ahead.

Once in Israel, Itzik learned he would have to go through the conversion process to become a rabbi because Ethiopians are not considered real Jews by some. Itzik already thought of himself as a Jew, so instead chose a career in criminal law.

"Besides," he smiled, "I want it to be just like L.A. Law!"

In Israel, law is studied on the undergraduate level. After serving three years as a medic in the Israeli army, Itzik entered Haifa University in the mechina (preparatory) program to improve his Hebrew. His biggest obstacle, though, was the law entrance exam, akin to the American SAT, and mandatory for many areas of higher education in Israel.

"Every person is allowed to take the exam in their mother tongue, but we [the Ethiopians] have to take the exam in Hebrew."

Itzik chose Haifa University to be close to his parents in Upper Nazareth. He said the faculty is supportive, and hopes his example will encourage other Ethopians to "work hard for what they believe in.

"The only time I look back on my life in Ethiopia is when I want to remember how lucky I am here. I don't feel like I'm alone in my work; I feel like I have a family here."

Disabled veterans provide teenagers with glimpse into realities of war

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The reality of war came home to Jewish day school students during a recent encounter with disabled Israeli veterans and the preteens didn't even blink.

"They're just like normal people, but they were in the army," said one Grade 8 student at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Nineteen veterans, three of them women, were in Toronto last month for a two-week visit hosted by Beit Halochem Canada, the Holy Blossom Temple and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation.

The vets toured the city, met Lt.-Gov. Henry Jackman at a Queen's Park reception and visited Bialik and Leo Baeck day schools.

At Bialik, four of the vets held court on the plastic chairs of the school library. Grade 6, 7 and 8 students filed in to listen to their stories, told in a mixture of Hebrew and English.

Chaim Friedman, 45, was injured in the head during an air force intelligence mission near the Suez Canal in 1971. Mildly paralyzed on his right side and walking with a cane, Friedman was the most visibly injured veteran in the group.

Hanan Altman, 42, on the other hand, covers the scars from his Yom Kippur War head injury with shoulder-length hair.

The students laughed when Avi Hatum, 55, recounted the day he proposed to his girlfriend.

Beit Halochem hosts visit to Toronto

His left arm was injured in the Yom Kippur War and she wouldn't marry him until she saw him do a handstand. The wedding took place soon after.

The quartet's unofficial spokesman was Kobi Caspi, 38, financial manager for Beit Halochem in Israel.

Caspi was a reserve tank captain when he was called up during the 1982 Lebanon invasion. A rocket attack left two of his crew dead, and him with burns to 45 per cent of his body. He finished his accountancy exams while recovering in hospital.

"The mind is what leads you, so if you feel healthy, you are healthy," Caspi told the students.

Beit Halochem runs three privately-funded rehabilitation and social centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem. Bialik's Grade 8 students raised $1,500 for the organization and Caspi said the money would go towards physiotherapy equipment.

Not all of Beit Halochem's clients were injured in combat. Riki Ben-Shabbat, 37, spent a year recovering from a car accident in which her right leg was almost severed.

Ben-Shabbat, then a newly married policewoman, was chasing a suspected drug dealer. The man got away "and I spent my honeymoon in the hospital," she says wryly.

Ben-Shabbat, like most of the others on the tour, was not visibly scarred. As a result, the students said they didn't think of them as disabled.

That thinking may be the same in Israel. Adena Farkas, 12, said she saw soldiers with canes and crutches when she was in Israel. "People don't stop and stare," she said. "It's normal there."

Restaurant loses COR in fee dispute

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hakerem Restaurant, one of the first kosher eating places to serve the new northern Jewish area, has lost its COR kashruth certification.

And owner Moshe David is furious.

"They [the Kashruth Council] are supposed to serve the community. When they took away my certification, I lost my business. The Torah doesn't allow that."

But Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council, said that David has been given every consideration.

The problem, David and Rabbi Levin both agree, has nothing to to do with the intricacies of kashruth, but is entirely related to the cost of supervision.

(Businesses supervised by the Kashruth Council are required to pay a fee to cover the cost of supervision. The amount varies according to the halachic requirements and the amount of supervision needed. For instance, restaurants like Hakerem, that serve meat, involve more detailed and constant supervision than, for example, bakeries.)

"I agreed to pay a lower cost," David says, "and they lowered the price, but it was still too much."

Rabbi Levin countered that "the Kashruth Council is non-profit. We only want to cover our costs, such as Canada Pension Plan and unemployment insurance contributions. Why should the mashgichim (those doing the supervision) suffer financially?"

Community funds, he said, can't be used to subsidize private enterprises.

"He pays rent and hydro, but he expects us to be a charity. We aren't."

The dispute came to a head about three weeks ago, David says, when he was called and told that his hechsher was being revoked. Shortly afterward, Rabbi Avraham Lowinger, the chief mashgiach of COR, came to the restaurant to take away the certification plaque.

"Rabbi Lowinger said that it's just like a mortgage, that if you don't pay the mortgage, the bank takes your house away," David said.

David also accused the Kashruth Council of coming down harder on him because he is a Sephardi.

"Before I got the hechsher six years ago, they said they couldn't give it to because they didn't know who I was. They said I had to prove I was Jewish."

Rabbi Levin was obviously upset by the suggestion that he is harder on Sephardim than on anyone else.

"Never in my life have I done that. I worked for years in Montreal, where there is a large Sephardic community, and I studied in Israel, where I saw how Sephardim weren't always treated well and I determined that I would never act like that."

David says he wants a full apology for the way he has been treated and for the removal of supervision.

The Kashruth Council has bent over backwards to help David out, Rabbi Levin says, giving him every latitude, including financially.

"We told him he had to be shomer shabbat for half a year before he could get the hechsher [approval]. He opened before that anyway, but we saw that he was being shomer shabbat, so we looked the other way.

"He had a good friend, a competent mashgiach, who was willing to cut his fee for him, so we said all right to that too."

Rabbi Levin said that there have been strained relations between David and COR since the restaurant opened, and that there have been problems collecting the supervisory fee for some time. Indeed, he said, David has not paid for a year.

He noted that COR sent David several letters warning him that they would remove his hechsher.

David is also angry that COR ran an ad in The Canadian Jewish News (May 19) saying that his restaurant is no longer under their supervision.

The ad, Rabbi Levin notes, does not suggest that kashruth was the problem. "If it was, we would have worded the ad to indicate that. . . It just says that we have withdrawn our supervision. How else are we supposed to protect the community."

Rabbi Levin says that he is willing to keep negotiating with David, but David wants the hechsher sign back first.

David says he would be willing to abide by the decision of a beth din (rabbinic court) as to whether they had the right to remove his kashruth certification.

While Rabbi Levin says he doesn't see why the situation is a matter for a beth din ("it's not a question of rights; it's simply a matter of payment for services"), he told The CJN. "If he decides to call us to a beth din, of course we would go."

In the meantime, David says, there is a competent mashgiach on the restaurant premises.

While Rabbi Levin said he could not comment on that aspect of the situation, he said that the Kashruth Council does not recognize private hashgachah (kashruth supervision).

The Certificate of Participation and Other Good Deeds

Every year, high school and college students by the hundreds are presented with a hand-lettered Certificate of Participation for completing an educational day—including a tour—at Benjamin's. Their comments positively affirm our belief in the importance of teaching this area of Jewish life. We also speak continuously to community groups, and lecture in schools on the religious, psychological and social context of our work.

Education, professional leadership and Tzedaka affirm Benjamin's role as a community resource. These are natural extensions of our everyday activities, fulfilling needs for Jewish dialogue, supporting innovations that better serve families, and providing support at the personal and professional level.

We are proud that today's students who come to learn about the mitzvot performed from the moment we are called, are the fifth generation to benefit from Benjamin's dedication to community service.

Reena launches review to modernize services

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Twenty years after its founding as the Jewish community's provider of services to developmentally disabled adults, the Reena Foundation is undergoing its first full "strategic review."

The review of all aspects of Reena's services is aimed at modernizing its approach and getting it ready for the 21st century, officials say.

For years, Reena has been faced with tighter community and government dollars, while demand for services has increased. Aging parents of people with developmental disabilities are becoming worried about what will happen to their children, who traditionally have had little say in how their lives are lived.

The need for frugality and compassion, coupled with the full force of other modern realities, have led Reena to reassess its whole approach.

Last autumn, the organization struck a strategic planning committee to map its future. Members of the community at large were invited to submit proposals. Reena heard from over 130 clients, families and staff, as well as other agencies and government officials.

The result has been a series of recommendations based on "climactic" changes over the years, says committee chair, Rob Berkovitz.

Among Reena's most pressing concerns is its waiting list. Some 200 families — and growing — currently await spaces in residential and day programs. About 20 are expected to come off the waiting list in the next six to eight months.

Relatively speaking, that's still better than the situation Metro-wide, where there are far more people with developmental disabilities on waiting lists than are actually receiving services.

Reena currently provides services and programs for 200 adults in residential care and about 100 in day programs. Roughly 60 per cent of the clientele is Jewish, and they receive Jewish programming. The organization maintains 22 homes throughout Metro.

The thrust of Reena's recommendations, Berkovitz told The CJN, centres on greater input from families — in terms of both involvement and money — and identifying those who need services at an earlier age.

Concerns expressed in the consultation process included aging parents, Reena's financial stability, quality of life for clients, family involvement, waiting for services and how Reena will manage change.

According to Reena chair Hy Eiley, Reena has "had to take a long, hard look at services. The age of entitlement is changing. We are looking for shared responsibilities and at moving from programs of support for individuals to a more customized fit."

The final recommendations, to be presented to officers as "a vision of Reena in the year 2000," is "not a retreat," Eiley insists. "It's a bold statement.

"We want the client to have a greater say. Another basic concern is will the family be there to help plan before it's too late?"

The vision for the Reena of the future includes:

- continuing to transmit Jewish values;
- providing support that is "consumer centred" rather than program centred — in other words, giving clients more control over their lives, as well as providing a greater breadth of services. Those who have developmental disabilities should have more "typical" lifestyles and relationships;
- being committed to lifelong support, or as long as a client requires services;
- striving for financial stability. While governments will continue to be the primary source of funds, Reena flatly concedes it will have to look for other sources for help, such as families of clients.
- having no more waiting list and becoming a "partner" with families, beginning when children are young;
- supporting more family involvement;
- integrating with other communal agencies

The final recommendations will be ratified later this month and presented at the Reena annual general meeting June 28.

Simcha Cricket Club wins championships

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Florida Panthers almost made the playoffs in their first year of operation. San Jose, in its third year in the NHL, got to the second round before being eliminated.

Well, change sports and ratchet down the calibre a notch or ten and the Simcha Cricket Club can still lay claim to quite an achievement in its first year of existence. The club recently won the in-house championship at Action Cricket, an indoor winter cricket league.

The boys at the Simcha Club were league-leaders during the regular season, posting a 12-2 record overall. In their first playoff encounter, they beat a team called The Classic, advancing to the championship game. They prevailed in that matchup winning a 94-93 nailbiter over Eight Imposters.

The victory was the result of a total team effort, said Elkan Reuben, captain and guiding force behind the team. Reuben, a native of India, said Simcha batted last and overcame the competition by registering 30 runs to lay claim to the league title.

Emmanual Joseph, who has represented India at the Maccabiah Games' cricket competition, scored several key runs late in the game to push Simcha to the championship, Reuben said.

For a club whose history goes all the [illegible] November 1993, that's quite an achievement. Reuben said the club was formed after several people responded to an article in The CJN calling for cricketers. The team has a complement of 15 guys, most of whom hail from England and India. One member of the team, Daniel Reynolds, was a veteran of Canada's gold medal baseball team at the last Maccabiah. He was named MVP of the championship game, Reuben said.

Russell Showman came to the team with plenty of cricket experience, having been named to England's Maccabiah team. Unfortunately, his move to Canada put him out of the lineup for that tournament but he was named Simcha's season MVP, Reuben said.

With this first hurdle behind it, Reuben said the team still aspires to one day form the nucleus of a Canadian entry in the cricket competition at the Maccabiah Games. In the meantime, Simcha is seeking more players for this summer's outdoor season as well as sponsors to help the team obtain badly needed equipment.

Simcha expects to play in the Toronto and District Cricket Association this summer, the city's elite league which also serves as a feeder for Canada's national team, Reuben said.

"We are building ourselves up to the international level. It's just a matter of practice," he said with a combination of hope and confidence.

For more information, contact Reuben at (416) 292-6975 or Shalom Jhirad at (905) 882-9332.

A MODERN PARADISE

Historical pageant to commemorate Jerusalem's trimillenium

In 1996, Jerusalem will commemorate its trimillenium, 3,000 years since King David made the hilltop town his capital.

Since then, Jerusalem has been a site of pilgrimage, a holy city. Today, it is also a modern city, with well-preserved historical and archeological sites, a rich cultural life and well-developed tourist facilities.

The multi-talented character of King David — musician, warrior, statesman, poet, dancer, king and lover — will inspire a full year of cultural events.

Any time in 1996 will be special in Jerusalem. The long warm season will allow many of the artistic events and concerts to be held outdoors.

Some will be in the ancient Sultan's Pool, just below the walls of the Old City. From David's Psalms, performed by world-renowned soloists and a huge chorus, to Verdi's opera Nabucco in the the Arena di Verona's lavish production, to international rock and pop concerts, there will be something for tourists of every age and taste.

Monumental sound-and-light shows depicting Jerusalem's history will be viewed from a hillside promenade overlooking historic and modern Jerusalem.

A spectacular historical pageant, with gigantic figures and thousands of marchers and musicians, will parade through the streets of Jerusalem.

A few thousand lucky diners will feast at "King David's Table," a one-time meal created by 15 of the world's great chefs.

There is more — biblical scenes by famous artists will be recreated in flowers, special museum exhibitions devoted to King David's era will be matched with special tours of unique archeological sites, and sport lovers will enjoy a series of major tournaments.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert encourages people to attend Jerusalem's 3,000th birthday.

"Blessing and inspiration have flowed from Jerusalem," he said. "The city has called forth religious longing and artistic creativity, in all ages,, from continents around the globe. But too often it has been a city of conflict."

The trimillenium, he said, "offers us an opportunity to renew our commitment to preserving and strengthening Jerusalem as a city where all may freely practice their faiths, where all may freely visit the shrines holy to their religions.

"In a time when old hatreds are falling and even older hatreds threaten to rise up again, we look to Jerusalem to be a herald of a new way that will allow hope and inspiration to shine upon the world from David's city."

There is a tradition that Jewish children studying the Hebrew alphabet have a drop of honey placed on each letter. This way, as they learn the language, they taste its sweetness.
IT'S NOT JUST HISTORY. IT'S YOUR HISTORY.
Jerusalem
Being Jewish, you are heir to a unique history, heritage, and culture. Perhaps you feel it sometimes more than other times. Perhaps, at times, you barely feel it at all. But it's there — inside a part of your heart, within a place in your soul. And that's why you owe it to yourself to visit the one place on earth where you will learn about so much — but nothing more than about yourself.

A selection of Jerusalem's restaurants

By SARA WAXMAN
Special to The CJN

For the observant North American Jew, Jerusalem offers a gastronomic revelation, a culinary miracle with a feast of foods and traditional dishes from over seventy countries. There is a new awareness of fine cuisine.

Israel's fois gras is cherished in France — its fresh herbs considered the best by Montreal's top chefs. While it was once seen as decadent to enjoy dining out, "cafe society" has suddenly blossomed in Jerusalem.

Some restaurants do not follow the rules of kashruth, but many do, and like the following, proudly display certificates that state Kosher under Rabbinate Supervision, or the more scrupulous, Glatt Kosher Limehadrin.

In 1992, 39,500 Canadians visited Israel. They ate well.

• Kohinoor — Jerusalem Hilton Hotel, 581-367

In this dazzling jewel of a restaurant with subdued lighting, fresh flowers, elegant decor and authentic Indian cuisine, we're served by well-versed waiters who patiently describe each of the over fifty dishes in detail.

Vegetarians will delight in the complexities of basmati rice cooked with nuts and fruits, soups of lentils, almonds or curried vegetables. From the tandoori oven, fresh breads, a whole fish stuffed with herbs, skewered chicken breast seasoned with coriander and mint, and lamb kabobs. Spicing can be ordered mild to fiery. Moderate.

• The Cow on the Roof — Sheraton Jerusalem Plaza Hotel, 47 King George St. 259-111

This lovely dining room has curtained tables for privacy, which makes it a favorite of VIPs. The night I was there Prime Minister and Mrs. Rabin dined at the next table.

Chef Shalom Kadosh's culinary alchemy fools the experts. It's hard to believe that his menu is impeccably Glatt Kosher: carpaccio with green salad, walnuts and sherry vinaigrette; filet of seabass and fresh vegetables prepared in a Chinese bamboo steamer; filet of veal wrapped in smoked goose breast served on risotto with bone marrow. The hot almond souffle with pistachio sauce would rate three stars in Paris! Expensive.

• Just outside the bustling Yehuda Mahane market, there are a number of small, meticulously clean restaurants, mainly Kurdish or Iraqi.

One of the best is Hashipudia, 3 Haarmonim St., 244-036, for charcoal grilled chicken, lamb or duck served with salads and made-to-order Iraqi bread. Soups, salads and stuffed vegetables are deliciously seasoned. An adventurous diner might want to try Yerushalmi mixed grill of organ meats: brains, heart, liver, bulls' testicles. Inexpensive.

• Mama Mia — 38 King George St. 248-080

One of the first houses built this century outside of city walls, now beautifully restored, is the new home of the best Italian kitchen in town.

Monique and Ely Ben Zachian make fresh pasta daily with extra virgin olive oil. Thyme, oregano, basil and sage are hand picked and simmer in sauces and soups. Fresh fruit gelati is made in state of the art equipment. Dairy only, and it's amazing how we don't miss the meat. Inexpensive.

• The ancient stone buildings on Yoel Salomon Street have been restored and are filled with a variety of charming restaurants and unusual shops.

Friday afternoons and Saturday nights (pre and post Shabbat), young people hang out at Etnachta and Roquefort pubs. The crowds spill over to the cobblestoned pedestrian mall. You'd think you were in Toronto's Yorkville.

Off the Square: (Dairy) #6 and (Meat) #17 present attractive and authentic, moderately priced Israeli dishes.

The Yemenite Step #10, 240-477 has cool, white plaster, arched walls, decorated with carpets and old family photos. Authentic dishes from Yemen — mellawach, a filo pastry cup of salad, and other pancake and pita-like breads go well with this cuisine's mainstay, vegetable soups filled with beef or chicken. Grilled liver and offal (shaweeya), baked Jerusalem artichoke and chicken, get lots of pizzaz from hilbe and zehug, breathtaking sauces which folk-medicine says cleanse the blood.

Inexpensive Tavlin, #16, 243-847. A terrific spot for people-watching, especially at breakfast. Comfortable dark wooden tables and chairs against white walls and an easy to deal with dairy menu makes this a popular meeting place for locals as well as tourists. Noam, who opened this spot in 1983 is on hand to greet guests and make suggestions. The kitchen makes terrific vegetable pies, broccoli and almond, artichokes in cream, for example, and a variety of crepes, including Bulgarian cheese. Blintzes with nuts, chocolate and whipped cream are a cut above what Mom made. Inexpensive.

• Zoosha — 10 Rehov Halamed Hei Wed., Thurs. and Sat., 8 p.m. to midnight.

A cross between new age and shtetl, this chassidic pub/coffeehouse/restaurant is in the basement of a modern Orthodox synagogue and attracts, well, everybody.

While listening to jazz improv, yiddish story tellers and comedians, you can sip mulled wine and nibble on Israeli salads, cheeses and home made challah. Created by a psychology student from California who longed to put some Jewish "neshamah" back into Israel. Inexpensive.

The Bell Caverns still retain a special aura of mystery

By CARL ALPERT

HAIFA — An enterprising travel agent wanting to offer tours for those who have already seen all the usual Israeli sights would do well to organize an exploration tour of the country's underworld.

No, this has nothing to do with crime. I am referring to the many fascinating sights located beneath the surface. For those of you who have already been to Israel more than once, how many of these places have you seen?

The enormous Bell Caverns, near Bet Guvrin, found by chance in 1928, and since excavated further. They were occupied by man in early history, but what they were used for is still a mystery.

The Carmelit subway in Haifa, an underground cable car which whisks passengers quickly from the top of Mt. Carmel to the city below, with four stops en route.

The underground vaulted pool of St. Helena, in Ramla, built in 789 C.E., the time of Haroun el-Raschid, the Caliph of Baghdad. Try rowing a boat around the mysterious arches.

The stalactite and stalagmite Soreq caves in the southern Judean hills — strikingly illuminated.

The network of Bar-Kochba hideaways, known as the Hazan caves, on the grounds of Moshav Amatzia, on the Jerusalem-Ashkelon road.

The Cave of Zedekiah, near Damascus Gate in Jerusalem, discovered in 1852, and said to be the quarries for Solomon's buildings.

Burial cave

Jason's Tomb, a burial cave on Alfasi Street in Rehavia, Jerusalem, decorated with drawings of ships. Discovered by chance in 1956 during excavations for a building.

The Zichron Yaakov Wine Cellars, with a taste of wine for the visitor.

The Hospice of St. John, which covers a large underground area in the old city of Acre.

The catacombs of Beth Shearim, near Tivon, outside of Haifa, with a wealth of historical associations and many old sarcophagi.

The sea-washed grottoes at Rosh Hanikra, at Israel's northern tip, reached by a descending cable car. A thrilling experience.

The Tomb of Queen Helena (the Jewish Queen) erroneously called the Tomb of the Kings, at the foot of Nablus in the northern end of East Jerusalem.

The long tunnel at Megiddo, built more than 3,000 years ago. Modern visitors can walk from the top of the mound to the exit far below.

Elijah's Cave, located at the foot of Mt. Carmel, where the spiritually attuned claim they can feel the "vibes."

The Carmel Caves of Stone Age man, off the Haifa-Tel Aviv road, where a sound and light show helps carry the visitor back to prehistoric times.

The elaborately painted ancient Roman burial cave at Ashkelon, closed to the public of late to preserve the vivid colors.

The recently opened extension of the Western Wall, leading far under the Old City of Jerusalem.

There are many more, each with its own dramatic story from the past. There's more to Israel than meets the eye on the surface.

Horse ranch offers a unique vacation

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

ISRAEL — Yehuda Avni dreams of saddling up one of his 20 horses, riding around the Sea of Galilee and across the international border to Amman, the capital of Jordan.

"When peace will come, and if it will be a real peace, then I would like to do it," says the Chicago-born Avni.

Avni is the proprietor of Vered Hagalil, a horse ranch and guest farm north of the Sea of Galilee. Vered Hagalil is Israel's oldest, and perhaps finest, establishments for equestrian pursuits.

Until true peace comes, Avni and other riders at Vered Hagalil must content themselves with the beautiful trails through the Galilee and neighbouring regions. Riders, accompanied by guides, may venture from the 40-acre ranch for as little as an hour or for as long as a week.

A popular excursion is the ride around the Sea of Galilee — known also as Lake Kinnereth — which takes a full day. The area is known for its scenic beauty and many sites of historical and archaeological importance.

"If they choose, people can ride for half a day, then sleep outside, and finish the ride the next day," says Yona Avni, Yehuda's wife. "We give them dinner at night and bring them breakfast in the morning." The cost of a full-day ride, accompanied by a guide, is $70 (US).

Popular excursion

Until the stones of the intifadah began flying, parties of riders used to leave Vered Hagalil regularly for Jerusalem, staying away for a week at a time. Now the most adventurous and hardy riders must content themselves with the five-day trek to Haifa.

Not all the ranch's clients are foreigners. Israelis are great riding enthusiasts, the Avnis claim, and many local children are enrolled in their Western-style riding school.

Approaching 70 years of age, Yehuda Avni grew up in the old west side of Chicago and came as a volunteer to Israel in 1949. "I felt very much at home here and decided to stay," he says. He met his wife on a kibbutz, and together they established Vered Hagalil (Rose of the Galilee in Hebrew) in the early '60s.

Western-style riding school

Now Vered Hagalil boasts a stable with fine Arabian quarter-horses and 18 guest cabins of varying sizes. Prices for double occupancy on weekends range from $50 for a small bunkhouse to $119 for a cosy cottage-apartment with kitchenette. Breakfast is included with all stays, and additional meals may be enjoyed in the restaurant (not kosher). "I think we were the first place in Israel to offer water to guests when they arrive," boasts Yoni.

Yehuda is proud of his Chicago roots, and still maintains strong connections to his native city, which he visits about every three years. Astute visitors may detect various Chicagoan memorabilia at Vered Hagalil, such as street signs; the guestbook contains the signatures of many prominent members of Chicago's Jewish community.

"Horses were always my hobby," Yehuda says. "Ever since I was a little boy, I used to skip school and go to the stables. I read all of the Zane Grey books."

Israel, being so compact, offers riders dramatic changes of scenery within relatively short riding distances. "You can ride through various regions of the country in a short time," he says.

"The only real dangerous thing in Israel are the drivers. Apart from that, Israel is in almost all aspects — homicides, robberies, et cetera — really a very safe country."

Isrotel chain opens luxurious hotel on Eilat's beach

EILAT — The Royal Beach Hotel, belonging to the Isrotel chain, has opened in Eilat.

The luxurious 380-room hotel is right on the beach and boasts, as part of its accommodations, 30 family rooms and 20 suites with all rooms overlooking the Red Sea.

Among the hotel's amenities are eight ethnic restaurants, three outdoor swimming pools and a spa. The Royal Lounge is for the use of all Royal room guests.

In addition, the Royal Beach also offers a number of convention facilities arranged around the hotel's multi-purpose conference hall that can seat up to 1,000 guests. The convention centre has five separate halls with adaptable stages, movie and sound projection and an advanced lighting system with internal communications.

Isrotel also runs the Riviera apartment, King Solomon Palace, Sport and Lagoona hotels. These properties are also situated in Eilat.

David Lewis, owner of the Isrotel chain, was among the first to introduce a new type of holiday concept into Israel, specifically Eilat.

This new concept focuses on non-stop entertainment of the highest standard, a range of fine restaurants at reasonable prices and a friendly young staff.

The decision to establish the chain in Israel was made because of the country's potential as an attractive tourist destination. The tourist season in Israel is particularly long, as it is all over the Mediterranean, but when coupled with Eilat's advantages, the tourist season expands throughout the year.

Israel's geographic versatility is also an added advantage — from the rolling hills of the Galilee in the north to the wild desert landscape in the Negev, from the peaks of the Judean Mountains to the northern tip of the Red Sea.

The managing director of the Isrotel chain, 48-year-old Raphael Sadeh is a veteran hotelier and a graduate of the Hotel and Management School in Lausanne, Switzerland. Throughout the years, Sadeh has held several senior positions in the largest hotel chains in Israel, as well as in the hotels of Europe and the United States.

Incentive market a 'fragile flower'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

ISRAEL — It's an established fact: almost three-quarters of all Canadians who travel to Israel, including Jewish-Canadians, do so as part of tour groups sponsored by communal organizations, church and synagogue groups, and archaeological, agricultural and other professional associations.

Until recently, however, the Canadian and American business communities have largely shied away from the Middle East, preferring to bring their conferences and incentive groups to locales in Europe, Asia or the United States because they appear politically less troublesome.

"The incentive market is extremely sensitive to a country's safety and security image," says Rafi Berri, executive director of Dannie's Tours, a Tel Aviv-based travel company specializing in incentive tours.

"So whenever there are headlines, the incentive market is the first to suffer."

If the incentive market is a fragile flower, it seems finally to be taking sturdy root in the ancient soil of Israel, say various players within the Israeli tourism industry. The picture has improved substantially, they contend, since the onset of the Israeli-PLO peace negotiations and the concomitant talks between Israel and her Arab neighbours.

"We're getting a lot of bookings from Canada for 1995," says Judy Poliva, conference and incentive manager for Eshet Tours of Tel Aviv, one of Israel's leading incentive producers.

In essence, an incentive is a reward offered to employees to spur their sales or productivity. Corporate and private incentive travel planners assert that travel is the best incentive, and that the possibility of a deluxe holiday can usually push a sluggish sales force into overdrive. Once targets are reached, they reason, the cost of the incentive trip can be deducted from the additional sales revenues generated, leaving a generous profit margin.

When it comes to incentives, Israel seems like the Promised Land for planners and participants alike, offering rewards no other country can duplicate. Participants can exult in a mudbath at a Dead Sea spa, enjoy a dinner-dance cruise on the Sea of Galilee, or relax at Israel's famous Red Sea beach resort of Eilat. Meals invariably take on a variety of themes — Biblical, Roman, Byzantine, Crusader — and can be served in unique historic settings like Jerusalem's Old City, the Roman ruins at Caesaria and the mountaintop fortress of Masada.

Activities for the adventurous include desert safaris by jeep, camel treks with the Bedouins, hikes through lush nature reserves and whitewater rafting on a tributary of the Jordan River. The spiritually-minded, meanwhile, may visit sites sacred to Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

To help incentives go smoothly, Israel boasts many high-quality hotels, transfer vehicles, tour guides and other specialists who understand the special needs of this sector. "There's much more awareness now than before, and it's increasing all the time," says Elhanan Dvir, president of Kennes Tours, which does an increasing amount of incentive business.

According to Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, a handful of Canadian incentive groups are set to visit Israel this year. She suggests incentive planners may wish to make bookings to coincide with either of two upcoming events — Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary in 1996 and Israel's 50th birthday in 1998. Both are certain to generate the sort of excitement that incentive planners seek.

The beauty of Upper Galilee

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

UPPER GALILEE — Israel's Upper Galilee is famed for its natural beauty, archaeological ruins and as the source of the Jordan River.

Visitors can easily spend a good deal of time in this region, touring parks, ancient sites, museums and towns like Kiryat Shmona and the fascinating mystical jewel known as Safed.

The towering forests and rippling waterways of the small but scenic Dan Nature Reserve sharply contradict Israel's image as a desert country. The greenery here is as lush and idyllic as any sylvan scene in southern Ontario. A hike through these woods involves crossing several rushing creeks and pools so pure that visitors may kneel down, cup their hands and drink. Emerging from rock springs, these are the frothy headwaters of the Jordan River.

After hiking for about 20 minutes, one emerges at a clearing where an archaeological site — the ancient city of Tel Dan — is being excavated. Formerly a Canaanite city- state named Leshem or Laish, the city was taken over by the biblical tribe of Dan. Looking north or west from these excavations, one sees Druze villages and the hills of Lebanon only two kilometres away.

It's often been said that anywhere you stick a shovel in the earth in Israel, you find something of interest, and it's certainly true in the Upper Galilee. Kazrin has the remains of a Jewish town of the Talmudic period, Banyas offers the ruins of an ancient city and the Muslim-Crusader era Nimrod Fortress, and Hazor features the ruins of an ancient city first mentioned in the 19th century BCE and which became one of King Solomon's chariot towns in the late 10th century BCE.

The Upper Galilee is also important for ornithologists, since it lies along the Syrian-African Rift Valley, a major transcontinental bird migration route. Here one may encounter birds of Euro-Siberian, Iranian and Mediterranean origin, side by side. In early May, our tour group happened upon hundreds of migrating storks, circling in the sky.

"Ornithologists often stay at our hotel in the fall and the spring," says David Duvdevani, sales manager of the 156-room Kfar Giladi Kibbutz Hotel. "Last fall, some people who had just arrived from Britain told us that if they saw one new species in the week, their whole trip would be worthwhile. At the end of the week, they were ecstatic because they had seen 42 new species."

Major towns in the Upper Galilee include Metulla and Kiryat Shemona, which lie near the top of the "finger" of land that points northward from the Sea of Galilee. In the middle of the finger is Rosh Pinna, where the first settlement in the Galilee was established in 1882.

Safed, which has more English spellings (Safad, Tsfad, Tzefa) than a jewel has facets, is set high in the Galilean mountains, with panoramic views of the surrounding countryside and the lake some 1,400 metres below.

Famed as a city of Jewish mystics, Safed was home to kabbalistic sages such as Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai (author of the Zohar), Rabbi Yosef Caro (author of the Shulchan Aruch) and Rabbi Itzhak Luria. Courtyards, stairways, arches and meandering narrow streets typify the Old City, which contains many small, historic synagogues built in memory of illustrious rabbis.

Safed has become a haven for artists, who have been attracted here by the rarified air as well as the low rents. Numerous shops sell original drawings, paintings and sculpture by local artisans. In a 150-year-old building beside the Crusader fortress, at the top of one of the city's main hills, American artist Philip Ratner has established the Israel Bible Museum.

Housed in the palace of a former Turkish pasha, the museum features a collection of Ratner's works that tell the story of the bible in painting, sculpture and graphics. The building, which has been occupied by a succession of artists, was in bad repair when Ratner and his wife rented it from the city about a decade ago; they have since put in about $100,000 in repairs, he says.

"If no one would have taken over this building, it would have gone like so many other buildings in Safed — by the wayside," Ratner says.

Apparently Safed, with a permanent population of only 21,000 residents, has more architectural treasures than its tax base can keep in reasonably good repair. To help offset this unfortunate neglect, be sure to put some money in the collection box when visiting synagogues and other historic buildings in town.

Tribute to Israel

Revitalized Old Jerusalem sends message of hope

World Zionist Press Service

It is a pleasant neighborhood with shady courtyards and spacious squares. Small buildings of mellow Jerusalem stone are decorated with latticed windows and wrought-iron doors; here and there a carefully tended plant provides a welcome splash of color. Elegant art galleries, small studios and sidewalk cafes create a carefree atmosphere. On a sunny day the place is a babel of tongues, as scores of tourists cross the main square in the wake of their tour guides. Sometimes there is a lull and one can hear voices raised in prayer: 12 yeshivot are scattered over the relatively small area.

This could be almost anywhere in Israel — Safed, perhaps. But around the corner of yet another winding street, one is brought up short by the sight of the Temple Mount sitting atop the vast esplanade of the Western Wall. This is Jerusalem's Jewish Quarter, whose bitter and brutal history is buried beneath its cobbled stones.

Here a series of disastrous events turned the Jews from a proud people, secure in their land, into a barely tolerated minority made to pay dearly for the privilege of living in the shadow of the Temple Mount — until the birth of the State of Israel.

With the destruction of the Second Temple and of Jerusalem by the armies of Titus in 70 CE, those Jews fortunate enough not to have been slaves or deported to Europe, were expelled from the city — a city the Romans then tried to wipe off the face of the earth. Monument after monument, house after house was reduced to rubble in an attempt to obliterate all traces of its glorious past, but to no avail. The name Jerusalem remained alive in the hearts and minds of the Jews.

Within less than a century, those who remained in the Holy Land returned to settle near the twin centres of their hopes: the Western Wall, which was all that remained of the works of Herod; and the Mount of Olives, where Divine Providence was said to have taken refuge and whence the Messiah would come forth on Judgment Day.

Periodically the Jews were driven away, but when the Crusaders took the city in 1089, some 1,000 Jews who lived there took refuge in their synagogue. For the greater glory of their god, the Crusaders set fire to the building.

With the fall of the Crusader kingdom a century later, Jews came back to live in Jerusalem once more. But their fate was not a happy one. They were subjected to restrictions and persecutions, could not own land or buildings, and were forbidden on pain of death to set foot on the Temple Mount, where the Muslim rulers had set up their own sanctuaries.

And yet they remained.

The ruins of a Byzantine market place — the Cardo — face a modern coffee house in the Old City's Jewish Quarter. [WZPS photo].

By the 16th century, the Ottomans, who now ruled Jerusalem and the Holy Land, relaxed their grip on the Jews; although the Jews still enjoyed no civil rights, life became a little easier. More and more Jews came to live in Jerusalem — some from Russia, others from Eastern Europe, driven by harsh conditions and by the lure of Zion.

By the middle of the 19th century, Jews were by far the largest religious group in Jerusalem. In 1900, 30,000 Jews lived in Jerusalem, more than the combined number of Moslems and Christians. In fact, the Jewish Quarter was so overcrowded that the more adventurous among the Jews began to leave the safety of the walled city to build new neighborhoods beyond the walls in Mishkenot Shaananim — the beginning of the modern city of Jerusalem.

The 1948 War of Independence saw the rebirth of the State of Israel. The Old City, however, was taken by the army of Transjordan. For the next 19 years, Jews could only see the Wall and the Temple Mount from afar. Then with Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War, the walls dividing the city tumbled. As Jews made their way to the Old City and the Jewish Quarter, they met scenes of destruction and desolution: ancient buildings deliberately blown up and reduced to rubble; goats and sheep wandering in and out of once hallowed synagogues; squalid slums encroaching ever closer to the Western Wall.

Paradoxically, the extent of the destruction made it possible to undertake extensive archaeological excavations while rebuilding the quarter from scratch. Many of the finds dated back to the period of the Second Temple, while some were even from the time of the First Temple. One of the most exciting is the Israelite Tower, where the defenders of Jerusalem fought a losing battle against the armies of Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BCE.

As we celebrate Jerusalem Day this year and look forward to the Third Millenium festivities due to start at the end of next year, some of us in Israel remember the day when then Mayor Teddy Kollek ordered the walls dividing the city taken down, a few days after the end of the Six Day War. In a rare emotional moment, it seemed as if the whole population of the city — Jews, Christians and Arabs alike — was on the move, eager to see the other side. That extraordinary day was not marred by a single security incident despite the huge crowds and the biggest traffic jam in the city's history. Perhaps there is a message of hope there.

Israel's state emblem

Jerusalem Dateline

The menorah has been a symbol of the Jewish people for over three thousand years. Its lamps were lit in the Tabernacle that accompanied the Children of Israel wandering in the Sinai Desert and its light illuminated the First and Second Temples. Since then it has served as a symbol of Jewish heritage in countless places in a variety of forms.

The menorah was chosen as the official emblem of the State of Israel. Today the menorah can be found on numerous Israeli government buildings and Israeli embassies the world over, in Israel's courts of law, on official stationery, and on the standard of the President of the State of Israel.

A five-metre-high menorah, sculpted by Benno Elkan, stands opposite the entrance to the Knesset, Israel's parliament. It is a massive word executed in bronze, and its seven branches are decorated with panels depicting highlights in the history and revival of the Jewish people.

Wall accessible to all

Violinist Yitzhak Perlman, a strong advocate of equal access for people with disabilities, inaugurated the new facilities in the tunnels under the Western Wall in Jerusalem, now made accessible to people with disabilities, as a result of an extensive project initiated by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). Work in the tunnels and the Old City was made possible by a special contribution from Larry and Leonore Zusman of Dayton, Ohio.

Visitors to the Old City of Jerusalem can now follow the footsteps of kings and prophets through the tunnels under the Western Wall by means of wheelchair lifts, ramps, elevators and other facilities.

The route will eventually include such sites as the Cardo, an ancient Roman marketplace thoroughfare which has been renovated and is the site for many shops in the Jewish Quarter, and the Burnt House, which is a recreated house from the Temple period. A visitors' guidance centre will also be available for information on access in the Old City for those who are disabled — including those with physical disabilities and visual or hearing impairments.

"As part of our effort to improve the lives of people with disabilities and their families, the [JDC] has already been involved in making such popular Israeli sites as Neot Kedumim, a recreated biblical nature reserve, and Tel Dan, an archeological site, accessible to the disabled," says Milton A. Wolf, president of JDC. "People with disabilities will now be able to visit many sites of religious and historical importance which have been closed to them until now."

The tunnel project was carried out in cooperation with the Ministry of Religious Affairs, the Western Wall Heritage Foundation, the Holy Sites Authority and the Jewish Quarter Development Company.

River clean-up means parks, less pollution

Jerusalem Dateline

Most people associate Israel with just one river: the Jordan. This river is revered and kept clean not only because of its Biblical fame, but because it provides much of Israel with its drinking water.

Less well known are such rivers as the Kishon and the Yarkon, the Hadera, and the threateningly-named Crocodile, where the reptiles swam until they became extinct several thousand years ago.

Israel's other rivers, mainly small streams that only become rivers as they near the Mediterranean Sea, have until recently been woefully neglected. Because their estuaries are near large population centres, many of the rivers became choked with industrial pollution and raw sewage. All that is changing following the establishment of a new Rivers Authority within the Environment Ministry.

"Israel is undergoing a revolution regarding its rivers," says Yeshaya Bar-Or, the director of the Environment Ministry's division of water quality. "There's still much to be done, but within four years we'll have refined effluents that will not cause aesthetic damage or pollute the water."

The most polluted rivers at present are the Kishon, which flows out through Haifa, the Sorek, which receives sewage from Jerusalem, and the Poleg near Netanya. The Lachish has often flooded the southern port city of Ashdod in recent years with a nauseating mixture of polluted waters. But with a spate of sewage treatment plants under construction and stiff fines for offending industrial enterprises, it is hoped that fish will soon be frequenting the country's rivers.

The Israeli cities of Ashdod, Haifa and Hadera will soon have their own river parklands. And near Netanya, on the River Alexander, an unusual project will result in unpolluted wetlands and swamps. A barrier of bulrushes and gravel will filter out polluted water through the bacteria that grow naturally in the bulrushes' roots.

"I doubt that anyone will drink from these rivers for many decades to come," says Bar-Or. "But they will be very pleasant and picturesque."

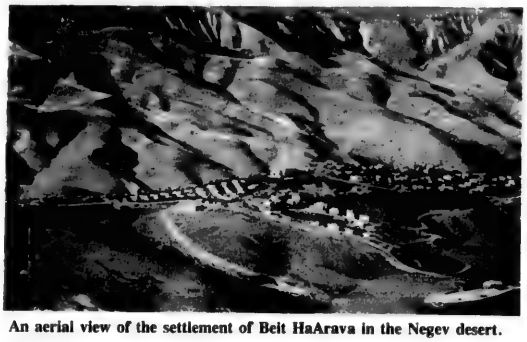
Israel's succcess in Negev examined at conference

World Zionist Press Service

The dictionary defines frontier as both the edge of civilization and an international border. It was appropriate, therefore, that many of the delegates at a three-day conference on Regional Development — The Challenge of the Frontier, were Israel's Arab neighbors.

Convened in December 1993 at Ein Bokek by the Dead Sea to mark the opening of Ben Gurion University's Negev Centre for Regional Development, the 350 participants from 30 countries discussed a diverse range of subjects affecting deserts worldwide — from regional policies and water conservation to alternative energy options, business and industrial options, education, health and welfare services and historical and literary perspectives of desert environments.

Conference organizer and the centre's director, Prof. Yehuda Gradus, described Israel's Negev region. Though referred to as a region, he said, it in fact comprises more than half of Israel's land mass and is the major land reserve for development. "But while developing housing, schools and jobs on an unprecedented scale," he said, "we must ensure that this development is respectful of the Negev's unique natural environment."



An aerial view of the settlement of Beit HaArava in the Negev desert.

Field trips to Jewish National Fund savannah parklands in the region, demonstrated Israel's success in pushing back the desert and preventing soil erosion. They also showed the surprising success of the Jewish Agency's Department of Rural and Urban Development in establishing agriculture based on the large amounts of highly saline geothermal water existing beneath the Negev.

Professor Jamal Safi, director of the Gaza Strip's Environment Protection and Research Institute and a former dean at Gaza's Al-Azhar University, delivered a paper entitled The State of the Environment in the Gaza Strip (which sits astride the Negev's northwestern border).

"There is an absence of environmental policy, awareness and education in Gaza," he noted. "The most pressing environmental problems we face include a catastrophic water shortage, water pollution, lack of sewage and solid waste treatment, and uncontrolled use of pesticides in agriculture."

But Safi was heartened by the fact that the Israelis and Palestinians were now talking rather than fighting.

This was also the sentiment that most encouraged Professor Ibrahim Abu Lehia, an eminent food technologist from Jordan interested in new methods of preventing crop surpluses from perishing in storage. "Now that we are pulling together," he said, "we can achieve so much more."

Canadian Professor Robert Butler of the University of Western Ontario, elaborated on the potential for tourism in desert and frontier locations. "These days tourists collect countries," he said. "The more distant the geographical location, the greater the appeal. But while tourism can create jobs in such faraway locations, it can also damage the environment. It is easier to develop tourism than it is to control it and the impact cannot easily be reserved."

Professor Elisha Efrat of Tel Aviv University, observed that only seven per cent of Israel's population (some 300,000) live in the vast Negev region. He criticized successive Israeli governments for establishing "undesirable" installations in the Negev, such as the Dimona nuclear reactor, the Ramat Hovav toxic waste dump, ammunition depots, armament industries and IDF firing ranges.

"All these installations have been created on an ad-hoc basis, without a regional plan," he said. "They create a barrier of pollution against future expansion to the south." But he insisted it was not too late to undo the damage. In an era of peace and greater affluence, the Negev could become an Israeli "Silicon Valley."

Ostraca (clay fragments) bearing what are believed to be the names of some of the Jewish defenders of Masada who used these tablets to cast lots in order to determine the order in which they would commit suicide rather than surrender to the besieging Romans. In the background is a model of Masada.

Masada finds on display

Jerusalem Dateline

Thousands of former volunteers from one of Israel's most ambitious and renowned archaeological excavations, the Masada dig (1963-65), now have their first chance to examine sone of the exhibition's most precious finds up close, along with other archaeology enthusiasts.

Thirty years after Professor Yigael Yadin of the Hebrew University began digging at Masada, and ten years after the famous archaeologist's death, the findings from one of Israel's most fascinating excavations are finally being displayed for the general public in an exhibition entitled The Story of Masada.

The exhibition is held under the joint auspices of the Hebrew University's Jerusalem Institute of Archaeology, the Israel Antiquities Authority and the Israel Exploration Society.

Masada, an ancient desert stronghold located on a flat plateau surrounded by cliffs and deep gorges overlooking the Dead Sea, was originally built by Herod the Great during the latter part of the first century BCE. In 70 CE, when Jerusalem fell, a number of warriors who had evaded capture joined a small group of Jewish fighting men and their families on Masada. Masada became the last stronghold of the Jews against the Romans in the Jewish Revolt, which culminated in the destruction of the Second Temple and the exile of the Jews from their homeland.

From the top of the mountain, one can still see clearly the remains of the encampments used by the Romans during the siege of Masada. When the Romans finally breached the walls of the fortress and defeat was at hand, Masada's 960 defenders — men, women and children — took their own lives rather than fall into the hands of their enemies. Their heroism was recorded by the historian Josephus in his volume entitled War of the Jews, where the author wrote that "the Romans came within the palace and so met with the multitude of the slain, but could take no pleasure in the fact, though it were done to their enemies. Nor could they do other than wonder at the courage of their resolution and the immovable contempt of death, which so great a number of them had shown, when they went through such an action as that was."

The fall of Masada in 73 CE marked the end of Jewish independence. In the 20th century, the site took on a symbolic role for Israelis — part of the Zionist ethos, epitomized by the Hebrew motto "Masada shall not fall again."

However, it was only in 1963 that the site was excavated by Yigael Yadin with the aid of thousands of Israeli and foreign volunteers. Daily, they would climb up the Roman ramp from a spartan base camp of tents offering short rations and cold showers, to sift through basket after basket of rubble for potsherds, pieces of glass, bone and other signs of a human presence. They did this for eight hours a day in the desert sun. Volunteers painstakingly uncovered balistra (stone balls) thrown by Roman catapults and reconstructed crumbled walls, sharing in the excitement when someone unearthed an oil lamp among the tons of dirt and debris.

While only a lucky few participating in the three-year dig were present at the discovery of a magnificently preserved sandal of a Jewish defender and pieces of jewelry found at the site, these finds and others are now on public display.

Participants have cited the dig as an unforgettable experience. Some attended a two-day reunion in Israel this spring. Many more former volunteers whom the Hebrew University was able to locate — a few now in their 70s and 80s — have written to the organizers expressing disappointment that they cannot attend, but relating how the dig was one of the highlights of their lives.

Among the items never before exhibited are unique papyrus records from the Roman army, including a list of equipment in the army infirmary, and inscriptions telling of shipments of food to Masada, such as "fish oil from Spain" and "apples and wine from Italy" sent to Masada for "Herod, King of the Jews."

Perhaps the most exciting find on display for the first time are the ostraca (clay fragments) bearing Hebrew names, including the name of Masada's leader, Ben-Yair, clay fragments that Yadin believed were the lots cast by the Masada defenders to determine the order in which they would commit suicide. This was related in detail by Josephus in his book Wars of the Jews, when he described how the last remaining "ten of them had been chosen by lot to be the executioners of the rest."

Water major source of conflict in the Middle East

World Zionist Press Service

At the Paris peace talks in 1919, the World Zionist Organization submitted a territorial plan for a Jewish State. The area it proposed included all of the Jordan River basin, the headwaters that feed it and part of the Litani River in southern Lebanon. The borders overlapped those of the British and French mandates with no regard for major population centres but with a clear demonstration of Israel's acute understanding of hydro-politics.

Today those same water sources flow through Judea and Samaria and link the four countries involved in the bilateral Middle East peace talks, thus creating a source of conflict. "Water is inextricably tied to territory and for that reason cannot be separated from the bilateral peace talks," says Marwan Haddad, head of the Palestinian delegation to the water talks.

In fact, some 33 per cent of Israel's water is from rain that falls in Judea and Samaria and an additional 15 per cent originates on the Golan Heights and in tributaries of the Jordan River in Lebanon.

So important is the water issue that the subject is being dealt with independently in the multilateral talks, where 40 states (12 of them Arab) meet biannually to discuss the potential for regional management of water resources.

Meanwhile, academics and entrepreneurs are increasingly considering water to be like every other commodity — producable or importable; it can be produced through desalination or imported from water-rich countries like Turkey.

But, according to Ora Tamir, legal advisor to the Israeli water commissioner and a participant in the regional water negotiations, "Water is money." It can be abundantly produced through desalination, but the process requires tremendous amounts of energy, which currently renders it too expensive for Israel.

The cost of desalinating one cubic metre (CM) of sea water to the point that renders it drinkable is between $1 and $1.25. The current cost of household water in Israel is about $0.30 per CM, although this price reflects substantial government subsidies.

However, according to Minister of Agriculture Yaakov Tsur, about 60 per cent of the water consumed in Israel goes to agriculture, which costs much less to process than potable water. There are desalination plants in Eilat and Ashdod, the latter being able to produce 20,000 CM per day, sufficient for 40,000 people.

According to Tamir and former water commissioner Dan Zaslasky, within the next several years, more efficient desalination technologies will be developed. Meanwhile, the Israeli government will probably continue to subsidize water costs to the tune of $200 million annually.

At the First International Israeli-Palestinian Conference on Water in 1992, Boaz Wachtel, a former assistant military attache at the Israeli Embassy in Washington, presented a plan called the Peace Canal. Simultaneously addressing both water and security concerns, it suggested the building of a pipeline to carry water from the elevated Ataturk Baraji Lake (800 meters above sea level) in eastern Turkey to Lake Tiberias (200 meters below sea level) and the Yarmouk River on the Syrian/Jordanian border. The pipeline would open up into a canal on the Golan Heights along the Israeli-Syrian border and serve as an anti-tank ditch.

In addition to conveying water to Syria, Jordan, Israel and the Palestinians, Wachtel's plan called for generating hydroelectric power which, Wachtel said, could be sold to Syria. The money, in turn, would go toward paying Turkey for the imported water.

Nonetheless, in March 1994, President Ezer Weizman visited Turkey and took up the issue of importing water, as did Foreign Minister Shimon Peres in April 1994.

An alternative to relying on transfer states like Syria to convey water is being promoted by a Canadian company which last year came up with a new method of importing fresh water. With Israel and Libya as its first two target countries, it has invented a huge, plastic sea-bound barge able to transfer 1.6 million cubic meters of water at a time — enough to fill about two-thirds of one of New York's World Trade Centre towers.

Agriculture Minister Tsur feels that this solution is impracticable. The ministry would far prefer to expand its desalination programs, which according to Energy Minister Moshe Shahal, will solve the Israeli-Palestinian water problems within the next 20 or 30 years.

Troubled Hebron: Arabs, Jews live separate lives

World Zionist Press Service

The troubled city of Hebron boasts 5,000 years of uninterrupted settlement. It was there, some 3,000 years ago, that David was anointed king. And it is in Hebron that the most revered shrine of the Jews is situated: the tomb of the Patriarch Abraham. It was with Abraham that God made his covenant, and to the seed of Abraham that the land of Canaan was promised.

Tradition has it that the superb building set up by King Herod over the Cave of the Patriarchs contains the mortal remains of Abraham's wife Sarah and son Itzhak, as well as of Jacob, Rebecca and Leah. Only the grave-markers, can be seen; the tombs themselves are in an inaccessible crypt below the main hall.

Hebron is today a thriving city, some 20 miles (36 kilometres) south of Jerusalem. It has a weekly sheep market, an oriental bazaar, a wholesale general market and a daily fresh vegetable market. Its two main industries are glass-blowing and leather.

Some 50,000 people live within the city limits (only 400 of them Jews), and a total of 120,000 live in what can be called "Greater Hebron" — the outlying suburbs, smaller villages and refugee camps.

The Arab population is solidly Sunni Muslim and deeply religious. Boys and girls attend separate schools and there are no cinemas, theatres or other forms of night life. More than 40 mosques are scattered throughout the city, the main one at the Cave of the Patriarchs.

Hebron was conquered in 638 CE by the Arabs, who henceforth called it "El Halil," the Friend, after one of the names of Abraham in the Koran — "The Friend of Allah the Compassionate." They set up their first mosque in the Cave of the Patriarchs.

There was no animosity towards the Jews then, perhaps because Byzantine Christians were the main enemy. But when Hebron was taken by the Crusaders at the beginning of the 12th century, they expelled Jews and Muslims alike and set up a church in what they called the "Castle of Saint Abraham."

With the fall of the Crusader Kingdom in the 13th century, Hebron once again became an Arab city. The Jews were allowed to return but neither they nor the Christians were allowed to enter the Cave of the Patriarchs. They had to stop on the seventh step of the stone stairs leading up to the eastern entrance of the building.

Despite this, Jews continued to live in Hebron in relative peace and tranquillity. Jewish craftsmen from Italy and Spain introduced the glass-blowing and leather industries to the town in the 16th century and by the mid-19th century, some 1,500 Jews lived there — one-tenth of the total population.

The rising tide of Arab nationalism at the beginning of the 20th century put an end to this centuries-old coexistence, and during Arab riots in 1929, 70 Jews were murdered and all Hebron's synagogues destroyed; survivors fled for their lives. Some 35 families returned to their homes in 1931, but in 1936, fearing another pogrom, the British Mandate authorities "advised" them to leave.

During Israel's struggle for Independence in 1948, Hebron came under Jordanian rule. Then in the 1967 Six Day War, Israeli troops entered the city and took it without a fight. Many religious Jews, including survivors of the 1929 massacre, immediately asked to be allowed to settle in the city of the Patriarchs.

As a first step, they set up the settlement of Kiryat Arba (City of the Four) — the ancient name of Hebron — at the northern end of the city. They soon built what is now a thriving industrial zone and later began reclaiming houses belonging to Jewish families in the centre of the Hebron. Today, there are an estimated 6,000 Jews living in Kiryat Arba.

Special arrangements were made by the military administration to enable both Jews and Arabs to pray in the Cave of the Patriarchs. But it was a losing battle from the beginning. Neither side was prepared to accept the presence of the other and violent incidents became common. Soon Hebron was at the forefront of the intifadah: religious Jews were killed on their way to prayer and in one incident in late 1992, acid was thrown at Jewish children at play in a kindergarten, lightly injuring six.

Militant residents of Kiryat Arba and Hebron led reprisal raids against the local population, wrecking cars and generally causing damage to property. The presence of large numbers of Israeli soldiers in the city was not sufficient to stem Arab violence and by September 1993, more than 30 Jewish civilians, including a pregnant woman and several children — many from Hebron — had been brutally murdered.

Miriam's Table

For 11 years, Miriam Myerowitz has been operating Miriam's Table out of B'nai Torah, as caterer for B'nai Torah Congregation. Prior to this time, she had 10 years' experience as a caterer in Vancouver. Her clients have included embassies and consulates.

Recently, both the hall and the synagogue have been given a total renovation and face lift. The decor is now in contemporary peach, green and turquoise. There is a French influence evident in the woodwork and the columns, and in the understated elegance of the new look. Besides the main hall, which can seat from 50 to 350 guests, there are several other meeting rooms suitable for smaller groups.

For busy people, Miriam offers an advisory service to take care of details such as finding florists, musicians, calligraphers or valet parking to do the invitation cards. This advisory service, which is free, will be of special value to women whose work and careers leave them with a constant shortage of time.

Full service is available for off-premise and take-out catering. Miriam's Table will cater boats, hotels and party rooms, as well as garden and house parties. Staff are knowledgeable, helpful, and always on hand to ensure that every function runs smoothly.

Miriam's Table offers a full range of traditional and international menus. On the meat side, there are such delicacies as chicken en croute, mushroom strudel with shitaki mushroom sauce, roasted vegetables, baby leaf salad with fresh raspberry vinaigrette, and crepes suzettes with bananas flambé. There are also dairy facilities. On the dairy side, you may savor such specialties as Salmon Wellington with caviar champagne dressing, wild rice and papaya, snow peas and sun-dried tomatoes, and white chocolate mousse with brandied blueberries.

To celebrate the new look, a full function from hors d'oeuvres to bar, including a four-course dinner and Viennese table, can be enjoyed for $47.50 per person, not including gratuities and taxes. Also, there are special rates for community organizations.

If you are thinking of Miriam's Table to cater your function or simcha, please feel welcome to call. Make an appointment to come in for dessert and coffee, view the premises and look over the new menus. Miriam's Table is located at 465 Patricia Ave.; Telephone (416) 225-3630.

Barak Jewellery is back with their new Judaica gift shop

BARAK Jewellery has expanded its store to sell not only jewellery, but Judaica gifts as well. Many of these gifts are hand crafted by top Israeli artists.

Besides gold and diamond jewellery, the store carries a large selection of Judaica gift items for all types of simchas, from weddings, bar mitzvahs, and bat mitzvahs to the high holidays and birthdays. The store carries items such as Kiddush cups, Passover and Shabbat plates, menorahs, candle sticks and perfume bottles. There are challah covers, matzoh covers, tallises, tefillin and kipot. The items are made from sterling silver, ceramics, silver and gold plate, and glass.

The store also carries pictures with Jewish and Israeli themes; some of these pictures are carved in sterling silver. Israel Barak, himself a painter, offers his work for sale through the store. His wife Esther, who is a designer, personalizes gifts with the names of the recipients; she also does the paintings on the ceramic mezuzahs.

Owner Israel Barak makes trips to Israel three or four times a year, to purchase new works of Israeli artists. As well as being a retailer, he is a wholesaler with a continent-wide reputation, who produces his own products here in Toronto and sells them throughout Canada and the United States.

His mezuzahs, both ceramic and metal, are a Barak specialty made here in Toronto. Barak is the largest manufacturer of mezuzahs in the world, with over 400 designs and more on the way. For this item alone, a free color catalogue is available on request.

There is something in this new Judaica store for every budget, from the most modest to the most lavish, with prices ranging from $10 to $2,000 or $3,000. Barak states that his prices are the best in town, and is willing to back the claim with a guarantee that he will not be undersold. If a customer can show that a competitor is offering an item at a lower price, he will reimburse the difference plus 10 percent on that item.

Israel Barak has over 20 years' experience as a jeweller. He is located in North York, at 294 Wilson Ave. on the north side, just west of Bathurst St. His new renovated ground-floor store provides the space and light that do justice to this selection of giftware. The telephone number is 633-6311. For those wishing to order the mezuzah catalogue by mail, the postal code is M3H 1S8.

Firm offers long term health care insurance

Let us be blunt. As horrible as it sounds, there are two ways to die, quickly or slowly. To die slowly is very expensive. Fortunately, the financial burden can be handled in advance, through a long term insurance policy which lets you plan your future health care.

With age, the probability increases that you or someone you love will need long term care. A 1990 estimate showed people aged 65 face a 43 percent chance of entering a long term facility, while 21 percent of people 65 or over who required long term care were in nursing homes.

Many people think the government will provide less and less health care in the future. Now, for the first time in Canada, seniors can meet this risk with an insurance policy for ages 50 through 80, and backed by the government through Compcorp.

Consider the alternatives. Ward care costs $30 per day, over and above government subsidies, or $900 per month. Government budget cuts mean that getting into a public nursing home at the same cost may mean waiting for years. Private nursing homes admit you at once, but at great expense. Semi-private or private room care may cost up to $2,400 monthly. Care at $75 per day amounts to over $27,000 per year after tax, or $40.000 taxable income—a huge burden for you or your spouse.

Long term care insurance enables you to pay for quality care without waiting. The income paid out is tax-free; when on claim, the plan pays up to $3,000 monthly. Benefits may last your entire lifetime or less, and be paid direct to you or the nursing home of your choice.

Anyone in a nursing home, on kidney dialysis or inhalation therapy, needing a mechanical device to breathe, or unable to perform normal daily activities like bathing, dressing, eating, toileting or walking indoors is not eligible. The plan is available to seniors of average health for their age, the ailments, aches and pains all seniors get.

Premiums can be as low as $10 per month. For the average 65-year-old, a $1,200 monthly benefit costs from $27.73 to $59.36 a month ($59.36 for a lifetime benefit). You are covered 24 hours a day with no waiting, and pay no premiums while receiving a claim. The plan covers recurrent confinements, convalescent and skilled nursing, a convalescent hospital or unit, and custodial and intermediate care.

There is a good chance that you or a loved one will need long term care. Remember: only those who do not need insurance right now, can buy it. Call United National Insurance Services now, at 1-800-661-3400.

Canadian soldiers to be Reena's special guests at Gala Dinner

Marshall Gottlieb

Ron Hoffman

Co-chairmen, Reena Foundation
20th Anniversary Gala Dinner Committee

On Wednesday, June 22nd, Reena's 20th anniversary dinner will be co-chaired by Ron Hoffman and Marshall Gottlieb. They have been best friends for 35 years, and are business partners. Marshall's son Stevie, age 26, is a client of Reena; Ron became interested in Reena through Marshall and both are now members of Reena's Board.

This dinner will feature a video presentation, unfolding like pages of a family album, to honor workers, volunteers and clients. It will also provide the opportunity to honor the Canadian soldiers of the 12th Armored Battalion, who cared for developmentally and physically handicapped people who had been abandoned by the staff of an Institution in Bosnia until the war moved on and the personnel returned. In addition, the dinner will honor Sam Handler, volunteer, fundraiser, past president and tireless worker.

Reena was founded in 1974 by parents of children with developmental handicaps, who wanted an alternative to institutions. In those days, as these children became adults, there was nowhere else for them to go, because they were considered "mentally incompetent".

Reena now owns or leases community homes, with staffing dependent on the specific needs of clients and the number of people. Reena provides a day program which teaches life skills, offers job and vocational training, and help in finding jobs. Reena also provides family service support for clients' families.

Since 1977, Reena has been a recognized social agency supported partly by government funding. Government cutbacks, however, mean more reliance on private sources. Reena currently has a waiting list of several hundred people which is growing faster than its ability to meet its needs in an environment of reduced government funding. It is expected that the dinner on June 22nd will help raise these much needed funds.

The Chairman and Board of Directors
The Reena Foundation

invite you to join them for an evening of dinner, dancing and rejoicement

Youth program proves a success

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's standard practice for a guest speaker to be thanked by members of a group he has addressed.

When the tables are turned, however, as happened following a meeting of the Shaarei Shomayim Youth Committee's Young Leadership program a few months ago, it usually means something out of the ordinary occurred.

The Shaarei Shomayim program, just finishing its pilot year, inspired Gerald Fisher, human resources development director at the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, to write a thank-you letter to synagogue president Sheldon Salcman commending the synagogue for a program "which will bear fruit for the entire community."

The program, with a dozen high school age participants, was conceived of and run by Toronto dentist John Gasner, 29, the chair of Shaarei Shomayim's youth committee.

"I wanted [people in that age] group to learn about our shul so that they could get involved," he told The CJN.

The nine sessions held over the year included nuts-and-bolts topics such as Public Speaking, with speaker Rabbi Mark Dratch; and How to Plan a Program, with Rick Levine of B'nai Brith Youth Organization.

Fisher led two sessions, including a discussion on Jewish Community Civics: Underlying Principles in Jewish Community Structure. Other sessions included How and Why We Pray: The Function of a Shul, with Rabbi Dratch.

Purim Carnival

Participants were given a chance to put some of their newly honed skills into practice when they planned and ran the shul's successful Purim Carnival in February.

Debra Weintraub, a 16-year-old student at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), has taken a number of leadership courses, and appreciated the opportunity to discuss issues with her peers.

The future of the Jewish community is one concern of this year's program participants, as well as being a motivating force behind the program.

"Your kids are in danger [of assimilation]," Fisher warned the group in a recent session. Statistics show that fourth-generation North American Jews are "really not likely to have any meaningful sense of Jewish identity," he said, noting Toronto Jews are less assimilated than their American counterparts because Toronto has fewer fourth-generation Jews.

"I want to be involved in the future of the Jewish community," says Jody Kasner, 18, a co-op student at York Mills Collegiate, who believes the community aspect is "what makes you Jewish." The shul is a good place to start becoming involved in the community, she said.

Jeff Erlich, 18, who completed his studies at Northern Secondary School in January, feels there's a lack of interest in religion among his generation. "I think tradition — like lighting candles and going to synagogue — is necessary to retain the group cohesiveness, [but] being part of a community is what it means to be Jewish."

"I'm very optimistic [about the future of the Jewish community]," said Robyn Naiberg, 15, a Grade 10 student at CHAT. "If we have people doing programs like this, it should turn out okay."

The youth leadership program is open to both members and non-members of the shul. For further information, call the Shaarei Shomayim office at 789-3213. A similar program for junior high school students may run next year.

Aspen readies for music festival

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

ASPEN, Colorado — Summer in Aspen, Colorado is a symphonic blend of music, dance, theatre and visual arts.

The 1994 Aspen Summer Music Festival, classical music's premier mountain venue, runs from June 23 to August 21, and features 150 concerts and events, ranging from orchestral to opera to chamber to jazz. As the festival readies itself for another marathon of music-making this summer, the strains of Mahler, Beethoven, Strauss and Gershwin will become part of the mountain air. To join the 100,000 visitors to this unique town is to discover just how invigorating that air is.

For decades, the sound of music at Aspen has had one primary location, the summer-only 1,700 seat Tent. Occasionally it shifted to the venerable Wheeler Opera House. However, in August 1993, the $7,000,000 Harris Concert Hall opened its doors — the first year-round performance facility in the Festival's 45-year history. Musicians and audiences have declared it a real winner. It was dubbed "a heaven of a hall," by The New York Times, and praised as "an acoustic marvel" by The Los Angeles Times.

The 500-seat facility is joined to the Music Tent by an open terrace. It also provides a lively, inspiring teaching environment for students, faculty and guest artists.

Among those presented this season are pianist Vladimir Feltsman, violinist Sara Chung, the Emerson Strong Quartet, the Dichter-McDuffie-Kershbaum Trio, and Pinchas Zuckerman. The season's classical benefit (July 23) will feature Emanuel Ax with the Aspen Festival Orchestra performing two Brahms piano concertos on the same evening, a pianistic tour de force.

Music Director Lawrence Foster, himself an Aspen Music School alumnus, returns to head a distinguished roster of conductors which includes Gerard Schwartz, James Conlon, Jaime Laredo and George Zinman.

Dance Aspen presents its annual Dance Festival from July 13 to August 20, featuring renowned dance companies, with programs ranging from classical and contemporary ballet through post-modern dance.

The Aspen Opera Centre will present Puccini's La Boheme (July 14-20) and Mozart's The Abduction from the Seraglio (August 13-17).

One of the highlights of Jazz-Aspen is A Gershwin Evening (August 6) which features Jeffrey Siegel and The Aspen Jazz Ensemble.

In a setting of the beauty and majesty of the Rocky Mountains, outdoor lovers will have an outstanding variety of activities to choose from in the area, including spectacular sightseeing trips.

To receive further information call (303) 925-3254 or write: Aspen Music Festival, P.O. Box AA, Aspen, Colorado 81612.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Jewish Hostages Tour: On the "chai" (18th) anniversary of the Entebbe Raid, two Jewish communal groups — Jewish Students Network Canada and Concerned Canadians for Jewish Hostages — are hosting a trip to Israel for students and young adults. The groups wish to use the anniversary of the Entebbe triumph to remember Jewish "hostages" such as Ron Arad and Jonathan Pollard who have yet to gain their freedom. Travel dates are June 29 to July 11. Price of $1,449 includes air and accommodations; $1,999 also includes taxes and food. Contact Network Canada, 783-1165.

Israel Summer Promotion: Last year, Toronto radio station CFRB conducted an extended promotion of Israel after a visit by popular talk show personality Andy Barrie. Now the all-talk radio station, situated at 1010 on the AM dial, is in the midst of a six-week promotional campaign which began when talk show host Jane Hawtin (noon to 2 p.m.) returned from Israel. Hawtin is featuring interviews from her tour on the show.

Listeners are asked to write a maximum of three lines to explain why they want to experience Israel. The grand prize winner receives a trip for two, courtesy of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, Sunquest Vacations and El Al Israel Airlines. Secondary prizes include Dead Sea beauty products, Elite chocolates and Israeli sandals.

The spot campaign features the slogan, "No One Belongs Here More Than You" as well as testimonials from recent visitors to Israel, including Ontario Conservative leader Mike Harris.

Liberation of Holland: Many Jewish servicemen in the Canadian Armed Forces during World War II were involved in the liberation of Holland (this writer's father among them). The Dutch people have never forgotten what Canadian soldiers did for their country and are inviting surviving Canadian veterans who took part in the liberation (or immediate family members) to be their guests during celebrations of the golden anniversary next year.

In cooperation with provinces and local communities, the Dutch government has established a "hosting" program through which Dutch families open their hearts and their homes to Canadian veterans for their entire stay in Holland. Hosting is to include lodging and all meals. A non-profit organization, the Welcome Again Veterans Foundation, located in Overijssel, Holland, has been set up to oversee the celebrations.

A brochure with complete details is available from Verstraete Travel Service Ltd., 14845 Yonge Street, Suite 210, Aurora ON L4G 6H8. Phone 905-969-8100 or toll-free 1-800-565- 9267. Verstraete has been appointed as the foundation's Canadian agent.

Viking Treasures: One millenium ago, Vikings reigned the seas, and the country from whence they originated — Denmark — commemorates their glory each summer with a series of Viking festivals. At least six such events unfold in the small Scandinavian country during June and July. Many permanent Viking sites are open to the public, including the Ladby ship, near the town of Kerteminde, where a Viking lord was buried in his ship surrounded by his best weapons, jewelry, riding horses and hunting dogs. The Bialik Children's Chorus. Standing at right is musical director Doron Ophir.

Bialik kids sing out loud in new tape

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lashir, an attractively packaged cassette tape of 10 handpicked songs performed by the Bialik Children's Chorus, will be of interest to students and alumni of Bialik Hebrew Day School as well as to anyone who enjoys Hebrew and Yiddish music.

The recently released cassette begins and ends with songs about singing. Doron Ophir, Bialik's musical director, explains that the first song, Lashir Ze Kmo Lihiot Yarden, which compares singing to a flowing river, is about the love of song and the connection between song and the sites of Israel.

One of the newest songs on the tape is Gan Sagur, a bouncy tune about two children who walk past their school on a day when it's closed. Chana Korenblum, 12, likes the song because it's "fun" and "cute."

An older lullaby will be familiar to many: Rozhinkes Mit Mandlen. "We're proud that Yiddish is part of the curriculum at Bialik," said Ophir.

Environmental issues are also worked into the curriculum, Ophir said. The environment features in two songs on the cassette: Boker Shel Zahav (A Golden Morning), about the beauty of the morning and Ha'har Hayarok (The Green Mountain), about Mount Carmel.

The songs on the tape were performed by the school's 25-member chamber choir, which sings separately from and also as part of the larger chorus. Space restrictions in the recording studio prohibited the larger group from making the recording, said Ophir.

"I see it as a school project," he emphasized, adding that the songs were culled from the choir's repertoire over the past six years. "I hope [all Bialik students] will feel [that they are] part of the project."

The school, which is affiliated with the Labor-Zionist movement, was established over 30 years ago. Its curriculum, of which music education is an integral part, is designed to imbue students with a love of Jewish tradition, Hebrew language and Israeli culture.

Students pay annual tribute to Chaim Nachman Bialik, the revered Jewish poet for whom the school is named, during presentations on Bialik Day. Bialik Songs Medley features his poetry set to music composed by Ophir, interspersed with readings written by Bialik teacher Rivka Atzmony and former Bialik student Jacob Korenblum.

Ophir takes pride in the choir he has directed since 1987. He found it exciting to see the students' progress both in terms of musical ability and Israeli accent, he said.

The album reflects months of preparation and almost a week in the recording studio. The musical accompaniment — guitars, flute and Ophir and his brother Uri on keyboard — was recorded at Uri's studio in Los Angeles.

"We spent about two hours on each song," Ophir said of the voice recording process. The painstaking process meant each student had to be in the exact same position when portions of songs were rerecorded. "I think it was an interesting experience for them and for me," said Ophir.

"It was tiring but fun," said Chana. "I would definitely want to do it again."

The cassette, a project of Bialik's parent-teacher association, is available at a cost of $10.95, either from the school or at a number of Judaica stores (Alef Bet Judaica, Matana Judaica, or Israel's).

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Yiddish Music at Earl Bales: The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and Yiddish songstress Theresa Tova are set to perform at the annual outdoor concert of the Committee for Yiddish, Earl Bales Park, North York, Monday June 20 at 7 p.m.

Tova, an actress in the television drama E.N.G., is known around town as a witty interpreter of theatre and jazz songs, and has won over audiences with her lively and delightful renditions of classic Yiddish tunes at numerous events within the Jewish community.

The public is encouraged to arrive early, to bring lawn chairs and blankets, and to use public transportation; the Bathurst bus stops at the site (Sheppard & Bathurst). In case of rain, the concert venue is the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 100 Elder St. Free admission.

Jewish Films at AGO: The Toronto Jewish Film Society presents Let's Fall in Love: A Singles Weekend at the Concord Hotel, and My Grandparents Had a Hotel, at the Jackman Hall, Art Gallery of Ontario, 317 Dundas St. in Toronto, on Sunday June 12 at 7.30 p.m. General admission is $7, AGO members $6.

Massey Hall Centennial: On Sunday June 12 from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m., Shuter and Victoria streets at Massey Hall will be closed to traffic to celebrate the hall's 100th anniversary. The street festival, guided tours, busker entertainment and stage performances (at 2 p.m. and 3:30 p.m.) are free.

* * *

Scarborough Players: This non-profit community theatre group, which has been presenting plays for 45 years, offers the Henry Decker comedy The Second Time Around, June 9 to 18. Scarborough Village Theatre, 3600 Kingston Rd. (at Markham Road), 416-396-4049.

* * *

Kids' Stuff at City Hall: Plate spinners, acrobats, contortionists, trampoline shows, puppets and rope twirlers are just some of the warm-up acts for a series of children's entertainers set to perform in Nathan Phillips Square at Toronto City Hall every Tuesday in July and August from noon to 2 p.m. Entertainers include Lenny Graf, Bob Schneider, Kirk & McGoo and Ronno & Friends.

On the Small Screen: Some interesting programs are due to air in coming weeks on Vision TV. On Tuesday June 14 at 8 p.m, Roots: Half the Kingdom examines the impact of feminism on the ancient religious and social structures of Judaism. On Wednesday June 15 at 7:30 p.m., The Curious Eye: Moise, a film by Howard Goldberg, studies the reaction of a chassidic couple to the mysterious appearance at their door of a baby boy in a basket.

Whatever Happened to Susi (June 24, 8 p.m.) tells the remarkable story of a Jewish girl removed from Nazi Germany to live with a Baptist minister and his wife in Wales.

And on Thursday June 30 at 8 p.m., Vision is offering The Evacuees, a feature film by Alan Parker set in the early days of World War II, when children were removed from the industrial cities of England to the safer countryside. The story concerns two Jewish boys from Manchester and their unhappy wartime evacuation.

* * *

Small Screen, Part II: Michael Waszynski's 1938 film The Dybbuk tells the famous chilling story of a Jew who performs some kabbalistic rites to invoke a demon. The atmospheric film is being shown in Yiddish with French subtitles on la Chaine, TVO's French network, Sunday June 26, 9 p.m.

* * *

New Arthur Miller Play: Fifty years to the month after Arthur Miller's first play opened on Broadway, a new play by the lauded American playwright opened at a New York theatre in May. Broken Glass, which takes its name from Kristallnacht, features Amy Irving as a Jewish wife who faces a sudden hysterical paralysis; Ronald Rifkin plays her husband. With this play, says New Yorker magazine, the 78-year-old Miller "has found a metaphor for the cycle of blame that seems to have stalemated modern life."

Mosque, temple share parking lot

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

It's an unusual arrangement, one that may well be unique in Canada and the world.

In the suburbs of Toronto, a Shi'ite mosque and a Reform temple share a parking lot — a cheek-by-jowl partnership that has fostered mutual visits and torn down stereotypes.

A video produced by Toronto documentary film-makers Coleman Romalis and Karen Shopsowitz, A Lot To Share, tells this interesting story.

Temple Har Zion and the Ja'ffari Islamic Centre sit side by side on Bayview Ave., sharing a tract of land used as a common lot for overflow parking.

For more than a decade, the two congregations coexisted, without any meaningful contact. The 1991 Gulf War triggered a much closer relationship. Indeed, it is ironic that Saddam Hussein — Iraq's bellicose strongman — brought the synagogue and the mosque closer together, comments Liyakatali Takim, the spiritual leader of the Ja'ffari Islamic Centre.

He and Michael Stroh, Har Zion's rabbi, were both concerned that the war would claim innocent civilian lives, which is exactly what happened. Iraqi Scud missiles killed and wounded people in Israel and Saudi Arabia, the site of some of the holiest places in Islam.

When the visits began, both sides were very careful not to offend each other inadvertently. For example, one Jewish woman wondered how her Muslim hosts would react to her Western clothes.

She needn't have worried. There were no unpleasant incidents. Recalling these early visits, a young Muslim woman with a traditional head scarf concludes that Har Zion's congregants are "just like us."

But, as Takim concedes without elaboration, not all his congregants are "agreeable" to the visits. Stereotypes have fallen, he adds, yet "there are still barriers."

He doesn't allude to them, but Rabbi Stroh touches on at least one divisive flashpoint when he suggests that the Arab-Israeli conflict still remains a taboo topic of conversation. As the two sides gain greater trust in each other, they may be willing to discuss the political situation in the Middle East, he says.

The film-makers suggest that ecumenism is possible between the two congregations because some of the members of the Ja'ffari Islamic Centre are East Indians from Africa who experienced ethnic and religious discrimination and, therefore, have something in common with Jews.

But, as Takim points out, Muslims and Jews share more than a legacy of suffering. They have similar dietary laws and, furthermore, both practise male circumcision.

Ultimately, though, Jews and Muslims inhabit different worlds. As Rabbi Stroh puts it, "Pluralism means people living together despite their differences."

A Lot To Share was screened recently at Temple Har Zion, with members of both congregations and invited guests viewing the video together.

Toronto musical duo delights adults as well as children

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — You're sure to hear the name The Treetop Kids more and more often now that Squirmies, their debut cassette has been released.

Jeff King and Marcy Tepner, the Toronto duo of musical performers for children are really a treat for family members of all ages to sing along, dance along or play along. It is a team that encourages active audience participation.

Wherever they perform, The Treetop Kids receive rave reviews because of their talent and the rapport they have with children.

Recently, they performed at the UJA March, and they are scheduled for a number of performances at Ontario Place, Cullen Garden's Miniature Village, Sick Kids Telethon and the City Parent Show, where King and Tepner will present their winning combination of songs, creative movements, costumes, props and a cast of imaginative characters.

King, who is the musical director and chief songwriter for The Treetop Kids, studied classical and jazz piano, music theory, song writing and keyboard harmony at the Royal Conservatory of Music, the New School of Music and the Alan Ray School of Music. He has composed music for a number of children's theatrical productions at the Leah Posluns Theatre in North York, including The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe, The Magician's Nephew and The Point.

King composed songs for a musical, Toronto — Sky's The Limit produced at the Canadian National Exhibition, and he participated in a Meaford Summer Stock production of The Fantastiks. He has toured extensively in Ontario as a children's performer and has written a number of short stories for children.

Tepner is an actress and singer who began performing professionally as a child in her hometown of Montreal.

In 1987, Tepner took a hiatus from performing to be with her two sons, Joshua and Michael. When her children were in school, she began teaching French and creative drama to preschool children. It was during this time that she met King and they discovered their mutual love of children and music that led to the creation of The Treetop Kids.

Their album incorporates a wide variety of styles from rock to reggae, with many of the songs dealing with issues that are important to children and families.

Hey Daddy focuses on the changing role of the family unit in today's society. The song, I Hope That's Enough for You, is a tribute to parents and the ever-increasing need for quality family time in today's world of hectic schedules, two income households, and long work hours.

Songs deal with subjects ranging from the environment to relationships. The title track, Squirmies, recognizes a child's short attention span, irrepressible energy and inability to sit still for any length of time. All the songs on the album are catchy and memorable.

The independent album, which was recorded at PRS Studio in Toronto, was produced and engineered by Gadi Foltys who also serves as The Treetop Kids' guitarist.

Squirmies is available at all Treetop Kids performances or by calling (416) 483-7637.

Assassins a quirky idea

TORONTO — Assassins is a musical, of all things, about losers who killed, or tried to kill, presidents of the United States.

John Wilkes Booth, who assassinated Abraham Lincoln in 1865, and Lee Harvey Oswald, who shot John F. Kennedy in 1963, are on stage along with seven other criminals. The play is held over at Canadian Stage downstairs, 26 Berkeley Street, until June 11.

It's a quirky idea, and only partly successful, despite good music and clever lyrics by the redoubtable Stephen Sondheim and an insightful script by John Weidman. Perhaps it requires too much suspension of belief to see and hear eight killers or wannabees convincing Oswald to assassinate Kennedy.

Under Jordan Merkur's direction, there are superb monologues by Richard McMillan, playing Samuel Byck aiming to knock off Richard Nixon by hijacking a jet and forcing the pilot to crash it into the White House.

You can enjoy Assassins, not as great theatre, but as a wickedly accurate portrait of the American Dream gone sour.

Anti-Semitism in America by Leonard Dinnerstein (Oxford University Press $35.00)

Is anti-Semitism on the rise in America? Should Jews worry about sporadic synagogue vandalism, the growth of the skinhead mentality and the deterioration of the once positive relationship with African Americans? Is Arab anti-Israel propaganda a cause for concern? Will the protracted economic recession lead to anti-Jewish feeling? Is the strength of Christian fundamentalism a threat to Jewish well-being and security?

These questions are among those considered by Leonard Dinnerstein, Professor of History at the University of Arizona, in this comprehensive and engrossing survey of American anti-Semitism from the colonial period to the present.

The author's conclusions are optimistic. He asserts that there is less bigotry in the United States than ever before, that Jews are now part of the power structure and have never been more at home in America. Despite unhappy episodes of prejudice and hatred, anti-Semitism has diminished almost to the point of insignificance and Jews have been increasingly accepted into the American mainstream. "Today anti-Semitism in the United States is neither virulent nor growing. It is not a powerful social or political force. Moreover, prejudicial comments are now beyond the bounds of respectable discourse and existing societal restraints prevent any overt anti-Semitic conduct except among small groups of disturbed adolescents, extremists, and powerless African Americans."

Nonetheless the author is concerned about several areas of present and potential difficulty. These include the great body of American Protestantism that still retains its bedrock of theological and critical hostility toward Jews, the hoary canard that the Jews killed Jesus, and some feminist extremists who depict Judaism as the "antithesis of feminist values." Recent polls conducted by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith reveal that about 17 per cent of white Americans and 37 per cent of African Americans might be classified as hard core anti-Semites. But what is somewhat comforting about these statistics — even if they are correct — is that physical violence toward Jews rarely occurs.

How does one account for African American anti-Semitism? The author offers a variety of reasons: the strong fundamentalist religious heritage, the psychological need to adopt a majority prejudice in order to achieve a sense of superiority, the negative interaction of some blacks and Jews in large American cities, the strong differences of opinion about such issues as quotas and affirmative action, and the rise of charismatic leaders who, in scapegoating Jews, have found a ready response from thoughtless and disaffected followers. The author quotes an American journalist who said that any black leader who stands up to the white establishment or makes white America leap on a chair in fright or revulsion will win the generous admiration of suffering black America.

It is unclear what Jews can do to eliminate the hostility that blacks feel toward them. But, certainly, what each group needs from the other is a strong dose of empathy and sensitivity to their respective fears and needs.

It is reassuring that a number of recent events which could have resulted in increased anti-Jewish feeling did not do so. These included the Middle Eastern oil embargoes in 1973 and again in 1978, the loss of the Vietnam War, the Pollard spy episode and the Wall Street inside trader scandals.

This comprehensive overview indicates how the Civil War led to the first major wave of anti-Semitism, the pernicious influence of Henry Ford, the dangerous fulminations of Father Charles Coughlin, the fear of Bolshevism during World War II which resulted in anti-Semitism and the anti-Jewish sentiments of Richard Nixon during his presidency.

Although Canada is not discussed, readers in this country should peruse this volume with undiminished interest, for what happens across the border will, sooner or later, in one way or another, occur here as well.

The 'Big Six' are expected to transform ...

By ALLISON KAPLAN SOMMER
Special to The CJN

ISRAEL — The "Big Six" are coming and bringing with them a change expected to transform the world of certified public accountants.

The Big Six are the vast, multinational accountancy firms that dominate the international financial markets, controlling 95 per cent of the global market, according to Globes magazine.

In every country they enter, they dominate. In Germany, Canada, Japan and Britain, the Big Six do more than 83 per cent of the accounting, the magazine said. Floating a company on any major stock exchange without an assessment by a Big Six firm is relatively rare.

In March, for the first time, an accounting firm in this country, Yigal Brightman and Co., committed itself to becoming the Israeli "member firm" of Deloitte and Touche, one of the Big Six.

Already, Brightman has made concrete moves toward its integration with the international firm. The company has dropped its local insurer in favor of participating in the insurance of Deloitte and Touche.

The other five of the six — Arthur Andersen, Price Waterhouse, Ernst and Young, KPMG and Coopers & Lybrand — are not far behind. All of them are communicating with large firms here, ranging from casual flirtation to serious negotiations. Within a year, those within the industry predict all six will have hooked up with local counterparts.

The accountancy scene here is rife with speculation over which firm will hook up with which member of the Big Six — and who will be left out. International companies will be directed straight to the member office in Tel Aviv.

The local Big Six member firms will have a huge advantage. When the dust settles, industry sources predict, this country will no longer have accountancy firms of all sizes.

Instead, there will be two kinds of offices: the six giants who will be guaranteed both international and local clients extensively involved overseas, and far behind, very small offices devoted primarily to companies whose only interest is domestic.

The most significant factor in the timing is the easing of the Arab boycott and the hoped-for completion of the peace process. The large accountancy firms have hesitated for decades to formally align with firms here for fear of endangering their business in the Arab world. In addition, all of them want to be established firmly now should Israel become the Hong Kong of the Middle East.

Business here has earned a spot on the map of the international business world. The formal alliances being put together now are built on the basis of up to a decade of informal contacts between local and international firms.

Becoming a member firm is a complicated process, since a number of egos, significant prestige and plenty of money are on the line for both sides. The local partner must open up its offices and its books to a thorough inspection by the Bix Six member and commit itself to sending its partners and workers abroad for short and extended periods to become fully integrated into the international entity.

Those involved say they feel it is worth paying the price. Being a Big Six partner is an invaluable stamp of validation.

"It will undoubtedly raise the standards of the whole industry, no doubt. It's a question of time," said a source close to one of the deals who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"In order to become a member of the Big Six and to stay a part of it, you must demonstrate professionalism and a commitment to top service. This is also going to benefit the economy of the State of Israel, since the international business contacts we get as part of these affiliations will mean profit for everyone."

Like any fundamental change, there are downsides. The largest accountancy firms here will lose some freedom and manoeuvering room once they are tied to a member of the Big Six.

Although there have been longstanding informal relationships with Big Six firms, they were nonexclusive ties. Firms here were able to shop around for an international accountancy firm to get the best deal for their clients.

The largest and most prestigious accountancy firms are expected to lose significant numbers of clients from the invasion of the Big Six.

"The big offices here in Israel are used to playing one of the Big Six against the others. Now they won't be able to do it anymore," said Danny Doron, president of the Institute of Certified Public Accountants in Israel.

$1 million note

TORONTO — Thornhill's Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue (BAYT) obviously believes that one good deal deserves another.

BAYT has just bought its second one million dollar note under the Israel Bonds program.

The note program offers promisory notes issued by the State of Israel, which are normally financed by Canadian banks at very favorable rates. Synagogues often profit because the interest Israel pays is usually higher than that charged by the bank.

BAYT chair Aryeh Glustein says his Orthodox synagogue is earning about $10,000 a year on the first note. now four years old, so the move to purchase another one was passed by the board with ease.

Several months ago, BAYT became Canada's first synagogue to twin with a West Bank community. BAYT's association with Beit El was a demonstration of humanitarian support for the situation faced by the residents of Judea and Samaria. The twinning was an important motivation for the synagogue to take on a second million dollar note.

... Israel's accountancy industry

"Frankly, I think that if it were left up to them, they'd rather continue with the status quo. The biggest firms seem to be dallying before signing with a Big Six firm."

But the smaller offices are scrambling to guarantee an affiliation. They are openly courting the Big Six, said a partner in a firm currently in intensive negotiations.

"It's a question of survival," he said. "It is a fact of life that they are all coming. It's definitely a case of if you can't beat 'em, join 'em."

Part of joining the Big Six means taking on their names — either a total change or an inclusion like Brightman, Deloitte and Touche. This will require a change in the bylaws of the Institute of Certified Public Accountants. Current bylaws state firms are not allowed to carry names of those who have never been CPAs in Israel.

Once the ties between offices are formalized, a desk in the local firm will handle overseas clients while an Israeli desk staffed by an Israeli accountant will be set up in the international firm.

Doron said he believes maintaining these desks and other costs associated with the overseas partnerships will significantly drive up overhead costs in the larger offices, which will be passed on to clients, making top-quality accountancy more expensive.

He is also wary of the possibility of disillusionment on the part of the Big Six partners if this country does not become the economic focal point of the Middle East in the near future.

"The firms are moving here on the belief that the peace process is a done deal. If we don't have the fruits of peace that we hope for, they might ask themselves what they are doing here."

Meeting Promotes Israeli Investment

NEW YORK — Representatives of more than 50 American companies heard tips recently on how to do business with Israel, and the payoff was immediate, with Tower Records announcing that they plan to open seven to 10 more branches in the next five years.

Speakers from several American firms that have done well in their Israeli operations offered practical advice on setting up subsidiaries, launching joint ventures and marketing Israeli goods in the United States.

The economic conference was sponsored in part by the Economic Mission, the New York-Israel Economic Development Partnership, the America-Israel Chamber of Commerce and the American Zionist Movement.

Despite the reference to Zionist interests, the emphasis was clearly on investing in Israel for purely business reasons.

Speakers cited the country's skilled labor force, high productivity, favorable government regulations and free trade agreements with the U.S. and European Market as major inducements to American companies like themselves.

Most said their companies had taken advantage of 38 per cent government loans for building plants in Zone A development towns such as Arad and Dimona, and all said they had hired extensively from the Soviet immigrant population.

The following briefs were compiled from information supplied by Israel's Economic Mission in Toronto, (416) 961-1242.

Israel Multiplies Profits

TORONTO — When it comes to investment success stories, the Bronfman family's Claridge Israel Inc. has always been considered a model. At a recent Toronto conference on business opportunities in Israel, Claridge Israel COO Mark Smith offered some startling figures to show why his company's pristine reputation is for real.

Claridge, according to Smith, has made $500 million in Israel, after investing over $100 million during an 18 month period.

Today, Claridge Israel controls the giant Teva Pharmaceuticals concern which just purchased a 34 per cent interest in the French firm, Prographarm International. Claridge is also responsible for Osem, the food manufacturer, and ECI Telecom, which Smith described as "unquestionably our biggest success."

The conference at which Smith spoke was organized by Israel's Economic Mission to Canada and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Firm Seeks Double Duty

JERUSALEM — Canadian-based James Richardson PTY Ltd. has quickly answered the call for a duty free store at Jerusalem's Atarot Airport. It would be the first such shop at the terminal.

James Richardson runs the duty free store at Ben Gurion Airport.

A decision about who is awarded the Atarot concession will be based on a public tender issued by Israel's Airports Authority.

Although Israel took over Atarot Airport in 1967, its use has been restricted to specific flights.

Directory Reflects Changing Times

ISRAEL — When historians are looking for the flavor of an era, they often turn to newspaper and magazine ads.

Decades from now, a recent ad in Israel Business Today, promoting an Arab fax directory, is sure to symbolize the dramatic changes currently underway.

The directory claims to contain the names, addresses and phone numbers, in both Arabic and English, of every company in 20 Arab countries.

The publication's price is $249 (US).

Victory Over Inflation

ISRAEL — Statistics compiled by Israel's Economic Mission to Canada shows just how well Israel has been wrestling with inflation.

The once infamous inflation rate of 18 per cent in 1992 was cut in half last year. The 1993 figure of 9.4 per cent is almost two full points below the average for 1990-1993.

However, recent steep housing price increases are creating inflation concerns this year.

The Israel overview assembled by Mission economic advisor Gabriel Regev also demonstrates the importance of diamond exports to North America. Diamonds account for over 29 per cent of Israel exports to Canada and the United States, followed by machinery, chemicals and textiles.

Business Boom Lures Discount Store

Heavy demand for office supplies is a sure sign of Israel's business growth. That's why the U.S. chain, Office Depot, will soon be opening its first facility in Tel Aviv.

Office Depot, which specializes in discount supplies, is one of several similar operations in the United States and Canada.

Other discounters can be expected to join Office Depot in Israel.

TORONTO — Great food, casual dining and low prices are the secret behind the success of Mr. Wong's Super Buffet in the Chinatown Centre, 222 Spadina Ave., 1221 Markham Road and a third location opening in mid-July at 1118 Finch Ave. W., says president and founder Alfred Wong.

What makes his buffet stand out from all the others, Wong says, is the innovative gourmet centre in which customers can watch the cook charbroil, fry, roast and — in the new Finch Avenue West location — stir fry. "When customers see their food cooking right in front of them, they know they are getting the freshest possible dishes."

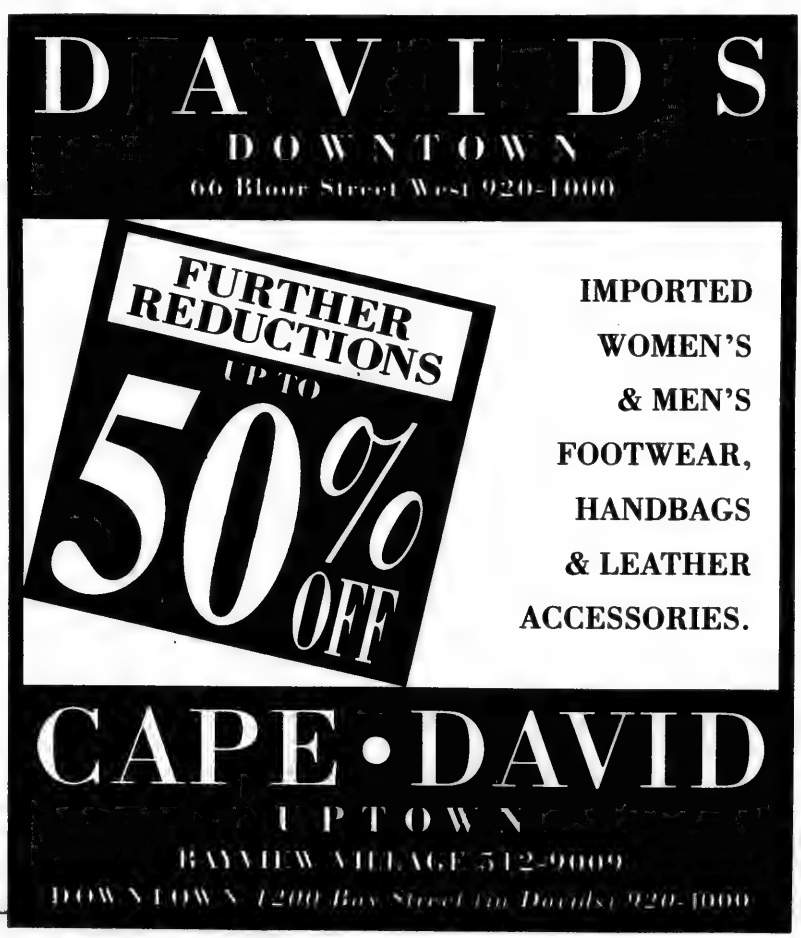
He says that the great resurgence in buffet dining in the last few years has come about as a result of the recession. "People are becoming very careful about their spending and there is no doubt that there is tremendous value in a buffet. For a fixed price, customers can eat as much as they want, as well as try a variety of foods. A great plus is that they can pick what is on display and not get stuck with a wrong choice from the menu. If an item is not to their taste, they can choose something else. Buffets are great for large parties because everyone can eat exactly what they want. That is quite difficult when ordering from a menu."

In a restaurant that seats almost 450 people and offers close to 200 items, Wong knows freshness is of the utmost importance. "We go to the food terminal every morning and because we do not have a fixed menu, we can purchase whatever is fresh. As well, our food does not sit around. It is prepared, taken to the dining room where it sits on a steam table and is immediately consumed. Everything is done according to strict government health regulations."

Wong says that the 10,000-square-foot kitchen in the downtown location acts as the central kitchen, where a lot of initial food preparation is done. "In planning our dishes, we choose the most popular items and those that are not labor intensive or cost prohibitive. That way, we offer what the people want and keep prices low. We make sure there is a large variety of meat, fish, vegetables, noodles and rice dishes so customers really do have a lot from which to choose. Dishes change from month to month but our customers can count on the most popular dishes always being there. We also offer some American dishes and loads of desserts so there is no excuse for anyone to go away hungry."

The casual, comfortable design at Mr. Wong's Buffet is condusive to relaxed dining and even though customers serve themselves, there is staff in abundance to clear dishes, serve drinks and bring new napkins. "We know that dining out is a treat and we go out of our way to make sure that everyone has an enjoyable experience," says Wong.

In answer to the inevitable question about how much people can eat, Wong says that "some people eat a lot, some people eat a little — it all averages out."



Tips From Pros

TORONTO — Many people wrongly believe that communication is a matter of words, so that anyone who uses words well communicates well.

This is not necessarily so.

There are believed to be about 600,000 words in the English language. In conversation, daily, the average intelligent person can use about 2,000, of which the 500 most commonly used have 14,000 dictionary definitions.

Mind boggling isn't it?

No wonder misunderstanding develops between you and the person you are communicating with.

There are numerous forms of communication, however, the most used is the combination of speaking and listening.

First Listening

It is only recently that we have paid much attention to the process known as 'listening.' We have been taught to read, write and speak, but few among us have been taught to listen. We Hear, But We Don't Listen. Here are some ideas you can use to improve your listening skills.

- Stop talking! You can't listen if you are talking.
- Put the talker at ease. Help him or her feel free to talk. This will remove a big barrier.
- Be genuinely interested. Look and act interested. Do not look away or engage in some other activity while the talker is talking. Listen to understand rather than to reply.
- Avoid distractions. Don't doodle, tap or shuffle papers. Try and avoid any body language that is disruptive and annoying to the speaker.
- Be patient. Don't interrupt. Don't jump in and supply the word he or she seems to be groping for. Allow the speaker time to finish.
- Stop Talking! This is the first and last rule, because all the others depend on it. You can't be a good listener while you are talking. Nature gave us two ears and one tongue, which is a gentle hint that we should listen more than we talk.

Speaking: Getting your message across.

How to develop the art of listening

Do you frequently have to repeat what you are saying? Do you often find you just didn't come across as you wanted? When this happens it's human nature to believe the fault lies with the other person. The following points will help enable you to talk with skill that leads to understanding by the listener.

- Remember, if you're not understood it's partly your fault.
- Identify and control any mannerisms you may have which could detract from what you have to say or divert your listener's attention.
- Create an environment for listening. There are many ways to get people to listen immediately. Include opening statements such as: "What do you think about.....?" "Could I ask your advice. . . . . ?"
- After you have gained attention, get to the subject immediately — don't leave your listener wondering what you are up to.
- Establish listener interest quickly — "You're the one that can do this best."
- Be logical and organized in what you say.
- Qualify your message and identify each separate step.
- Get feedback.

Impressive as our accomplishments are in the illimitable miles of the outer universe, one of the most exciting dimensions in our daily lives is the few inches from your lips to another person's ear. If you can conquer that space almost nothing is impossible to you.

Equally important is developing the art of listening. No one did it better than Harvard's famed professor Charles T. Copeland who was asked by a student:

"Is there anything I can do to learn the art of conversation?"

"Yes there is one thing," said Copeland. "If you will listen I will tell you."

For several moments there was silence. Then the student said: "I'm listening professor."

"You see!" said Copeland. "You are learning already."

Experts outline positive guidelines for franchisees

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Prospective franchisees shouldn't look at the acrimonious relationship between Pizza Pizza and its affiliates as typical, said the franchising director of a rival pizza chain.

"It makes it seem like franchisors are ogres, when in many cases that's not the case," said Humphrey Kadaner, director of franchising for Pizza Hut.

Kadaner was pointing to court complaints filed against Pizza Pizza by 48 of its 250 franchisees. [Last week Pizza Pizza was kicked out of the 200-member Canadian Franchise Association because it failed to adhere to the association's code of ethics.]

Kadaner was speaking at a franchising forum sponsored by the Young Business Network of the United Jewish Appeal. The forum, titled What's on the Menu: A Fresh Look at Franchising, was held at the Lipa Green Building last month.

Similar business styles

Others speakers were Scott Stainman, owner of Kernals Popcorn Limited, and Lawrence Smith, vice-president of the Ontario operations for Monsieur Felix & Mr. Norton Cookies Inc.

Kadaner said a positive franchisee-franchisor is based on corporate ownership in the business; clearly understood roles; similar business styles; and solicited input.

He also said the franchisor must act with integrity, quoting PepsiCo chair Wayne Calloway as saying if you're afraid to see a business decision written up in the newspaper, then you might want to reconsider it.

PepsiCo is the parent company of Pizza Hut.

If he was investing in a franchise today, Kadaner said he would look for a franchisor with corporately-owned stores since it raises the franchisor's stake in the business; otherwise "[the franchisor] might not be as focused on the bottom line."

Stainman of Kernals Popcorn says franchisees entering a mall should chose a central location.

"These days in the recession [fewer and fewer people are walking the entire mall. People visit a mall now much more on a mission," he said. "They go into a mall, they want to buy a shirt, they buy the shirt and they get out. The number of visits to a shopping centre are fewer per year and the time spent per visit is less."

Smith, of Monsieur Felix & Mr. Norton, observed that a good franchise agreement sets the cornerstone for 10 to 20 years of relations.

"It's important to ensure that the franchise agreement is solid," he said.

He went over the Monsieur Felix & Mr. Norton Cookies franchise agreement, which covers areas such as a contact in case of problems, franchisor history, definitions of words and terms in the contract, term of the agreement broken down into renewal periods, stipulation for renewal, record keeping, royalties, and franchise and advertising fees.

He advised potential franchisees to take agreements to a franchise lawyer, of which there are a handful in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, instead of a corporate lawyer.

"If you take it to a corporate lawyer, who's basically good at contracts, he's going to have all sorts of questions — he's going to be learning at your expense."

Hungarian survivors hold commemoration

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Hungarian Holocaust survivors lit memorial candles, placed a wreath in memory of labor camp victims and recited prayers at Beth Hazichoron Congregation's recent 50th anniversary commemoration of the Holocaust.

Andrew Winter, president of the congregation, said that the service was in honor of the six million Jews, of whom over 600,000 were Hungarians, who lost their lives in the Holocaust.

"The Jewish Holocaust was a war against innocent civilians," he said. "A group of countries became united in a systematic slaughter of our people. We want to let people know that we refuse to forget that it ever happened. Those who do not remember the past are condemned to repeat it."

Eli Rubenstein, who brought greetings from Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and who is of Hungarian heritage, said that "50 years ago, my entire family was taken away and few came back. My teacher, Emil Fackenheim said that Jews who are privileged to be alive after the Holocaust have an 11th commandment to follow — thou shall not grant Hitler a posthumous victory."

MPP Monte Kwinter acknowledged the young people at the service and said, "Fewer and fewer survivors are going to be with us. It is gratifying to see children keep the memory of a people who suffered the tyranny of the Nazis. We must always remember so the world will never forget.

MP Barry Campbell told the crowd that he had difficulty comprehending the magnitude of the number six million until he was reminded that before the Holocaust of six million, it was a family tragedy with individual loss. "As I watched survivors light the memorial candles one by one, it helped me to understand the magnitude of the loss."

Rabbi George Landesman, former chief rabbi of Hungary and rabbi of Beth Hazichoron Congregation speaking in Hungarian and English, said, "We would like to forget this tragedy ever happened, but we must remember. We must remember day to day and night to night. We do not need a memento because we have to carry it in our hearts and our minds."

The service also included the sounding of the shofar, the placing of flowers by Jewish youth as a testimony to the future, the singing of Eli, Eli and Shivisi, the recital of K'El Maleh Rachamim by Cantor Giora Sharon, and the recital by Rita Lajos of the poem My Prayer, written by Andrew Winter.

A letter from Winter was distributed to the congregation, in which he said, "We note with sorrow the great dissipation of a once vibrant and strong community that now has factioned off into many small groups soon to disappear. It is the wish of our congregation to maintain and strengthen our cultural presence in the community ... The Hungarian Jewish culture is deep in its richness and it is our obligation and duty to have it carried forward to the next generation, not just in name only."

He said that a committee has been formed for the purpose of "raising funds to build a Hungarian Jewish Community Centre that will house meetings, classrooms and a place of worship for the social, educational and spiritual enrichment of its followers."

Report urges crackdown on racism

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

SALMON ARM, B.C. — A provincial cabinet post whose sole function is the prevention of the spread of racist activity and the elimination of racist organizations is urgently needed in British Columbia, says the director of the Salmon Arm Coalition Against Racism (SACAR).

David Lethbridge, a professor of psychology at the Salmon Arm Community College, organized SACAR two years ago, to fight fascism and racism. The group issued its first report on racist activities in the Okanagan region of British Columbia in October 1992. Now Lethbridge has updated the report in a new 125-page document, which outlines some of the work done by his organization.

The focus of both reports is organized racism in the Okanagan in the B.C. interior and, says Lethbridge, "SACAR maintains there exists a worldwide network of neo-Nazis, neo-fascists, anti-Semites, white supremacists and Holocaust-denial organizations . . . The network extends into the local region. The danger is real."

There is no easy or short-term victory over organized racism, anti-Semitism or fascism, the report states. The struggle has been constant since the beginning of the century, and information received earlier this year indicates neo-Nazi activity was at an all time high in the United States in 1993, with bombings and stockpiling of explosives rampant.

SACAR, which is a volunteer-operated organization, has one purpose, says Lethbridge — the expansion and elimination of organized racial hatred, through gathering and analyzing information, holding meetings and hosting conferences, and supplying information to the media. "We press for the seizure of racist and genocidal hate literature and press for the criminal convictions of racist and fascist leaders. When necessary, SACAR holds protests and pickets racist meetings."

Lethbridge says SACAR helped the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Toronto in its work against Holocaust-denier David Irving.

The report gives details of the activities of a number of individuals and organizations engaged in alleged racist movements and says SACAR has accumulated a library of some 75 books which have information about neo-fascist groups.

Lethbridge lists organizations which have helped SACAR gather information; these include the Anti-Defamation League, B.C. Organization to Fight Racism (with which Canadian Jewish Congress is affiliated), Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region, Okanagan Jewish Community Association, Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

For more information on SACAR or to get copies of the report ($20), contact Lethbridge at (604) 832-6678. The address is 3521 20 Ave., NE, Salmon Arm, B.C. V1E 4M4.

Cheers star leads in Damn Yankees

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Tony Award-winner and Cheers television star Bebe Neuwirth plays the female lead in a walloping revival of the 1956 hit Damn Yankees.

Her co-star is Victor Garber, a Jewish lad from London, Ont.

Damn Yankees began as a novel by Douglas Wallop, The Year The Yankees Lost The Pennant, with music and lyrics by Richard Adler and Jerry Ross. Songs like You Gotta Have Heart, Whatever Lola Wants and Shoeless Joe From Hannibal, Mo. are Broadway standards.

Bob Fosse choreographed the original play, a musical comedy about a middle-aged baseball fan who sells his soul to the devil to become a grand slam slugger.

Garber plays Applegate, a new kind of devil — witty, sardonic, sophisticated and a gifted farceur.

He transforms Jarrod Emick into whiz kid Joe Hardy, and introduces him to the temptress Lola, played by Neuwirth. Neuwirth is surprisingly delightful and her dancing and singing prowess will come as a revelation to her TV fans.

Gwen Verdon, the original Lola, was the most magical musical-comedy performer I ever saw on stage, but in Neuwirth the producers have a Lola for the '90s, one of the very few performers who will not suffer from the comparison.

Director Jack O'Brien has given the show punch and panache, resulting in an exciting mix of song, dance and athleticism, especially in the Blooper Ballet number. Choreographer Rob Marshall builds on the original jazzy steps by Fosse.

I would rate the show a three-bagger, just falling short of hitting the ball out of the park.

This hot box office ticket is linked to some degree to the Yankees' 1994 performance in baseball's Eastern Division. It will be hard to keep alive the magical image of George Steinbrenner's aggregation if they achieve the dubious distinction of being contenders for the cellar.

Appearing for an indefinite run at the Marquis Theatre, Broadway and 46th Street.

For tickets call Ticketmaster at 1-800-755-4000.

Lubavitch Rebbe dies

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Tens of thousands of Chassidim flocked to Brooklyn's Crown Heights neighborhood in tribute to Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who died in Manhattan's Beth Israel Hospital early Sunday morning, June 12, at the age of 92.

A monumental figure in the modern-day Jewish world who headed the Chabad Lubavitch chassidic movement, Rabbi Schneerson was mourned by followers around the globe, many of whom believed him to be the Messiah.

Chabad is an acronym for the Hebrew words for wisdom, understanding and knowledge.

At Lubavitch headquarters in Brooklyn, thousands of mourners gathered Sunday afternoon under overcast skies to join the funeral procession to the cemetery in Queens.

He left no heirs to assume leadership over the fervently Orthodox movement he headed for 44 years.

As a result, the Rebbe's death leaves a gaping leadership vacuum in the Lubavitch movement, which claims 250,000 followers worldwide, and operates Chabad outreach centres across the globe.

Rabbi Schneerson had been hospitalized last February after suffering repeated seizures stemming from a stroke he had in 1992, which paralyzed the right side of his body and left him bedridden and unable to communicate.

On March 10, Rabbi Schneerson suffered a second stroke, which doctors said "seriously weakened" the left side of his body.

Though officials of the Lubavitch movement were characteristically optimistic about the Rebbe's condition, in his final weeks when he lay unconscious supported by a respirator, they were forced to concede that his condition had deteriorated.

During the week preceding his death, the Rebbe had suffered kidney failure. At 7 p.m. on Saturday, he went into cardiac arrest, but his condition was later stabilized. Early Sunday morning, at 12:55 a.m., he suffered a second cardiac arrest and was pronounced dead at 1:50 a.m.

Rabbi Schneerson was buried next to his wife, Chaya Moussia, and his father-in-law — Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn, the previous Lubavitcher Rebbe — at Old Montefiore Cemetery.

While attendance at the burial was restricted, there was an emotional scene earlier outside Lubavitch headquarters in Crown Heights, as an estimated 35,000 followers waited for their first glimpse of the Rebbe's coffin.

When the coffin was brought outside, the cries of grief mounted as scores of men tried to touch the plain pine box.

Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson — 1902-1994

The 350 police on the scene could barely contain the surging crowds, and the pallbearers had difficulty getting the coffin into a waiting hearse.

The crowds walked behind the slowly moving vehicle, which led them on a processional through the Crown Heights neighborhood.

Some 50 buses were waiting to take some of the Rebbe's followers to the cemetery after the procession was over.

Among the dignitaries present at Lubavitch headquarters were Israeli ambassador to the United States Itamar Rabinovich; Gad Ya'acobi, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations; New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani; Colette Avital, Israeli consul general in New York; and Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of Israel's opposition Likud bloc.

In Israel, the focus of mourning was Kfar Chabad, the village that is the centre of the Israeli Lubavitch movement.

Crowds of Lubavitcher Chassidim mobbed Ben-Gurion International Airport, offering to pay cash for any ticket that might get them to the funeral on time.

El Al Israel Airlines scheduled an extra flight on a jumbo jet for some 450 of the Rebbe's followers. But neither El Al nor any of the foreign airlines that serve Israel had other craft they could divert for the thousands who thronged into the departure area.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin saluted the Rebbe as a great scholar who had made a vast contribution to the entire Jewish people.

"The Rebbe's loss is a loss for all of the Jewish people," he said. "A great sage is gone, a distinguished leader."

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres described the Rebbe as "a leader of the highest stature, a great man and a scholar, who labored selflessly on behalf of Jews of the Soviet Union and other countries behind the Iron Curtain."

Representing Israel at the funeral, at the express wish of Rabin and the Chabad movement, was Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau.

Rabbi Schneerson was a charismatic, magnetic presence whose talks and writings on Jewish mysticism and philosophy were central to Lubavitch thought.

When he became immobilized and unable to communicate after his 1992 stroke, his circle of aides rushed to fill the power vacuum.

But conflict arose over the course of the movement, and particularly over the campaign to declare Rabbi Schneerson as the Messiah.

According to Jewish tradition, there is a potential Messiah in every generation who will reveal himself if and when the world is ready.

In their effort to get the Rebbe to emerge and declare himself the Messiah, Lubavitchers stressed the importance of performing mitzvot

Even those in the Chabad-Lubavitch movement who had not acknowledged that the Rebbe was the Messiah nonetheless attributed to him the qualities necessary for being the world's savior.

Because the Rebbe left neither descendants nor a designated successor, Chabad has been left with no apparent leader for the first time in its history.

Caught up in the belief that the Rebbe had messianic powers and potential, the Lubavitchers would never even discuss the possibility of his passing and therefore prepared no one to take his place.

Within the last year, thousands of his followers at the 770 Eastern Parkway headquarters in Brooklyn would burst into singing "We want Moshiach now."

Sometimes, in the Rebbe's presence, they would chant rhythmically, "Long live our master, our teacher, our rabbi, the King Messiah for ever and ever."

Much controversy arose when the Rebbe's followers burst into this song after Rabbi Schneerson suffered a stroke two years ago. At the time, the Rebbe seemed to pump his one good arm up and down, as though conducting this specific chant.

Many in the Lubavitch community claimed he was thereby acknowledging that he was the Messiah.

His followers cited many worldly occurrences that, to them, proved that the Rebbe was the harbinger of the end of days. These included the downfall of communism and the Soviet Union, the mass emigrations of Jews from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia — which followers described as nothing less than the biblically prophesied ingathering of the exiles — and the very few casualties in Israel during the Persian Gulf War.

The Rebbe was also credited with having performed numerous miracles, from the medical to the personal.

Three years ago, the Rebbe himself told his followers: "We are at the threshold of the future redemption."

The Rebbe sat in a specially constructed balcony seat after his stroke, which had deprived him of much range of motion and the ability to speak. Despite the overwhelming handicaps, he nevertheless continued to pray and to hear letters read to him.

The leadership of the Chabad movement was riven by disputes over whether to proclaim him the Messiah.

At the end of January, a group of followers was going to try to anoint the rebbe as "King Messiah." Only a last-minute move to prevent the Rebbe from appearing prevented the ceremony from taking place.

During the Rebbe's final illness, the Lubavitchers, through their telephone hot line, would call for more fasting on Mondays and Thursdays, the reciting of psalms, learning Torah and giving tzedakah (charity), in multiples of 92, so that the Rebbe would reach that age.

The hot-line message was often spoken by a rabbi who was crying.

Jewish and Sikh leaders to fight Legion decision

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish and Sikh leaders said last week they would use open dialogue and provincial human rights legislation to fight Royal Canadian Legion branches that ban religious headgear.

The Canadian Jewish Congress and the World Sikh Organization of Canada met for six hours recently to hammer out an action plan. The two groups agreed that open discussion "is the most promising option available," followed by legal redress, according to Congress president Irving Abella.

"It serves no purpose shouting and screaming," Abella told a press conference the following morning. He called resolution through dialogue "the Canadian way."

Ottawa high school holds first graduation

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — With smiles bright enough to light the room, five teenaged girls last week became the first graduates of Machon Sarah, Ottawa's first Jewish high school for girls.

The school was born four years ago when two parents, Tom Caplan and Danny Friedman, were trying to decide where their daughters would go once they finished elementary school. Ottawa had two part-time Jewish studies high school programs, but no all day Jewish high school.

"There we were," says Caplan, "our kids were growing up in a religious environment and a lot of our friends were sending their kids out of town."

They could do the same, to which an alarmed Caplan says, "Yonina [his daughter] was only 12!" or they could start a school in Ottawa.

Two more families came aboard and so, with two low-rent rooms provided by the Jewish Youth Library in Ottawa, little money, four students and a few rabbis and teachers shared with the Ottawa Torah Institute, a boys yeshivah, the little school opened its doors. It now has 12 students.

To hear the teachers tell it, the girls of the graduating class, in fact all the girls in the school, are clever, motivated, cheerful, self-reliant and occasionally silly — in short, a joy.

"They are really fun to teach," says English teacher Karen Atkinson. "There's no discipline problem at all. I think I learned as much from them as they did from me. They are a teacher's dream, they really are."

"It was a fantastic experience", says Rabbi Howard Finkelstein, spiritual leader at Congregation Beth Shalom West and one of the Jewish studies teachers at the school."I looked forward to every day of the week to be there with these girls because these are dedicated, intelligent, creative girls who love to learn Torah."

"If things are not organized for the girls of Machon Sarah, the girls, without any further ado, will organize it themselves," says Stewart Boston, the school's secular studies director.

In September, although they were all in Grade 12, the girls decided to fast-track to graduation and finish their Grade 12 and OAC courses.

For the students, Machon Sarah meant hard work and friends.

"It means a lot more to us than just any high school because we were so involved in founding it, making it, carrying it on," says Yonina Caplan, class valedictorian. "And we've become so close to everyone, the teachers and the students, it's something very special."

How close did they become?

"Even though they were together all day, from 8:30 in the morning until 6:00," says Tom Caplan,"it didn't mean they didn't get together in the evening, or they weren't on the phone all night."

As well as putting in a full day at school, the girls volunteered in the community. They visited residents in the Jewish home for the aged, helped new mothers on Friday's to prepare for Shabbat and went several times to the Museum of Civilization in Hull to teach people how to make Chanukah menorahs and play dreidel.

One student, Robyn Ruttenberg, recently won a service award for her volunteer work, including regular visits to a group home for developmentally delayed Jewish adults. She taught them Hebrew, prepared them for the Jewish holidays and visited on Saturday twice a month to lead havdalah.

Erin Gordon came into the school in Grade 11, two years after she and her family began practising Orthodox Judaism. She came to Machon Sarah from Ottawa's specialty arts high school after a lifetime of secular education. She welcomed the structure.

"At public school we had no boundaries, you can do anything you want whenever you want, just follow a few school rules that they did have. At Machon Sarah there were more boundaries, but the boundaries they set weren't rigid, they were understood, they were also Torah boundaries."

Next year the five graduates will continue their studies. Four girls are going to yeshivot or seminaries in Canada and Israel. Only Leah Shifra Ben-Porat is going directly to university to study math, a move she admits will be a big adjustment.

And the little school will carry on.

"I think for too long," says secular director Boston, "Machon Sarah has been the best kept secret in Ottawa."

St. Catharines kids get taste of various ethnic holidays

Multicultural atmosphere

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When one thinks about schools with active multicultural programs, one would not likely think of Grapeview Public School, a new elementary school in St. Catharines.

Teacher Mike Paquet has created Celebration, in which students celebrate different ethnic holidays, such as Chinese New Year and St. Patrick's Day, and many Jewish holidays, including Purim, Chanukah and Passover.

Taking a cue from the Ontario Ministry of Education's cross-curriculum approach, language, math, design technology, art and experience are used to further multicultural awareness, lessen (in Grapeview's case, Paquet says, to hopefully avoid) racism and increase understanding.

A hugely successful "festival of light" in December taught about Christmas, Chanukah and the Hindu Festival of Light through music, poetry, study and cooking (the latkes were a great hit, Paquet says).

Paquet uses cooking extensively in his program, and not just because he likes cooking and everyone enjoys eating different foods. Math skills are strengthened in the measuring necessary for cooking, study skills are learned while researching different customs and recipes, and, he feels, children get a better understanding of other cultures through finding out about their food customs.

Popular projects have included making doughnuts for St. Patrick's Day ("my grandmother always made doughnuts on St. Patrick's Day!"), harvest soup for the end of October, groundhog stew for February and sourdough starter for Mothers' Day.

On Heritage Day in February, they examined all the different ethnic groups in the class and, Paquet says, learned about their common bonds.

Canada's past is not neglected either. Margaret Bourgouis, the first French Canadian teacher, enticed children (especially native children) to come to her school by dropping toffee along the path. Paquet's class remembered her by making toffee.

Paquet's Celebration program is based on a project he did while working on his master's degree in education at Brock University, but his interest in ethnic culture was whetted during his years teaching at Westminster Public School in Thornhill, which has a large Jewish population.

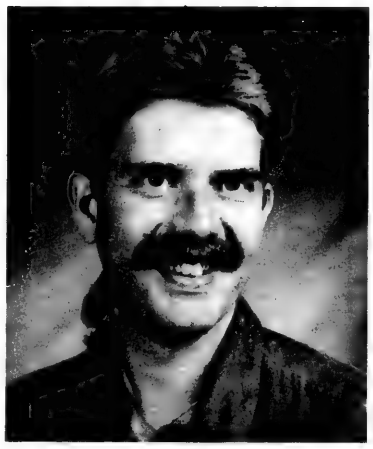
"One year, we were booked into Scanlon Green Conservation Area for a nature program. It was only after all the preparations were made that we discovered the reservations fell during Passover."

Since reservations were very difficult to get, the situation threatened to be a touchy one. "We brought brand-new utensils and kosher food and did our own cooking. The parents were very appreciative, and it was a phenomenal experience for everyone. I never forgot it."

Rosalie Samosh, a Jewish parent in the school, is part of Grapeview's multicultural committee, set up by school principal Ricky Lampman.

"We want to integrate community resources and people into the program," said Samosh, the daughter of Niagara Falls Rabbi Nathan Liberman.

She said the committee hopes to get natives from the Native Centre in St. Catharines to come and speak, and wants students to see the Freedom Trail, a part of the history of Ontario's black community.



Mike Paquet

"And I go in and make hamantaschen," she added.

The committee also hopes to put out a multicultural cookbook next year, to create exhibits in the front hall of the school, and to arrange a special program for next March 21, which has been set aside as a day for the elimination of racial discrimination in Ontario.

There are only about 10 Jewish children in the student body of 550 youngsters, Samosh said. "So it's really important for my son to have his holiday acknowledged by his teacher and his school."

Samosh is enthusiastic about the multicultural atmosphere at Grapeview School. "It teaches tolerance in a non-threatening way."

Israeli music, food at Jerusalem pavilion

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Torontonians will have a chance to enjoy Israeli music, dancing and food at the downtown Jewish Community Centre later this month, when B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) sponsors this year's Jerusalem pavilion at Festival Caravan.

The annual multicultural festival, which features 40 pavilions representing a variety of international cities, will run from June 17 to 24. (The Jerusalem pavilion opens June 18, motzei Shabbat, and will be closed on June 24.)

This year's festival is focusing on activities which will appeal to the whole family, in recognition of 1994 as the Year of the Family.

At the Jerusalem pavilion, indoor entertainment will be provided by the Jerusalem Dancers under artistic choreographer Rivka Atzmony, and by the Neimot Singers under musical director Doron Ophir. A cabaret show featuring Israeli singer Ahuva, accompanied by Ted Lebow, will be held on the rooftop garden, (weather permitting).

Falafel, chumous, pita, turkey schnitzel and a variety of Middle Eastern desserts will be on the menu specially prepared for this year's pavilion by Caterers York Ltd.

Monty Mazin of B'nai Brith will serve as pavilion mayor for the third consecutive year. Leah Eichler, a student volunteer at BBC, will be the Jerusalem pavillion princess.

The pavilion will have "the most extensive exhibits ever," according to a BBC news release. Displays will include Jerusalem's Jaffa Gate and Western Wall. Then Consulate General of Israel in Toronto has provided a poster exhibit by Jerusalem artist Raffi Etgar, depicting "Israel Today."

"How appropriate the theme — Year of the Family — a concept central to Canadian and Israeli life," says Lorne Bernstein, chair of the Jerusalem pavilion.

Hours for the Jerusalem pavilion are June 18, motzei Shabbat to 1 a.m.; June 19, 3 p.m. to 11 p.m.; June 20-23, 6 p.m. to 11 p.m. The downtown JCC is located at 750 Spadina Ave., just south of Bloor.

Passports for the entire festival, at $14, may be purchased in advance from B'nai Brith Canada, the Caravan office (977-0466), Metro branches of the Bank of Montreal or Bell Phonecentres in Metro. During the festival, passports are available at all Caravan pavilions. One-day passports cost $7. Admission is free for children 12 and under.

Montreal Legion branch rejects bylaw against turbans, kippot

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Royal Canadian Legion branch in Cote St. Luc, at the recent national convention in Calgary, has roundly denounced the rejection by Legion members of a proposed bylaw that would have permitted Sikhs, Jews and others to wear religious headdresses.

Lou Lang, spokesman of the Brig. Frederick Kisch branch, said the branch intends to send a "letter of protest" to the Legion's central body.

The Kisch branch will continue to allow turbans, kippot or other such headwear in its hall on Mackle Road, Lang said. The Calgary decision leaves it up to individual Legion branches to set their own policy on the matter.

The Kisch branch, whose members are Jewish except for "one or two per cent," did not have a representative at the Calgary convention due mainly to the expense of sending someone, Lang said.

Lang, a past Kisch president and veteran of the Royal Air Force (RAF) Ferry Command which transported aircraft to the front, said when contacted by The CJN that a letter of protest was being drafted.

Kisch is named for a highly-decorated British army officer, who fought in World War I and II. He died while clearing land mines in North Africa.

Originally based in downtown Montreal when it was founded in October 1944, the branch is open to those of all faiths, but evolved into the "Jewish branch" with its location in Cote St. Luc, Lang said. It has almost 200 members today.

Lang noted that much of the membership of the Legion especially in smaller centres in made up of those who are not veterans and the Legion halls often serve as social gathering places for a variety of people. By contrast, Kisch's membership is composed of "99 per cent" veterans, he said.

"You really don't know who is speaking for veterans," he said.

Ralph Charad, of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Montreal Post — which is not Legion-affiliated — also disagreed with the ban on religious headcoverings in Legion halls. "I would make a distinction with a place of worship, where one should obey the rules. But a veterans' meeting place is not a place of worship...

"If [Sikhs, Jews and other religious minorities] were good enough to serve us in the heaviest military campaigns, they are good enough to be admitted [in their traditional headcoverings]."

Charad, also an RAF veteran, thinks most of the resistance to these differences come from the smaller towns where veterans formed "a very cohesive" group, unaccustomed to practices unlike their own, and their Legion halls are like social clubs.

"In the big cities, like Montreal where the membership is a hodgepodge, there's more tolerance."

The Jewish War Veterans split off from the Legion about 20 years ago because of the latter's injunction against political activity or representation in other public bodies.

Charad said no single issue provoked the split, but the separation has enabled Jewish war veterans to be present as a group within such organizations as Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith.

B.C. MLAs speak out against Legion rule

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The Royal Canadian Legion's failure to change its hats-off rule at the recent national convention in Calgary has been condemned unanimously by the British Columbia legislature.

Sikhs, Jews and Legion members were among the MLAs who voted to criticize the Legion decision.

All routine legislature business was dropped to debate the special motion protesting the Legion decision to vote against a by-law that would have allowed members to wear religious head coverings into clubrooms.

The motion was carefully worded to congratulate those branches that don't discriminate against religious headgear, while sending a clear message of condemnation to those branches that do. Many legionnaires believe in baring one's head to show respect for the dead.

The Newton branch in the Vancouver suburb of Surrey used the no-hats policy to prohibit Sikh veterans from entering the bar last Remembrance Day. The decorated Sikh veterans had been invited to Remembrance Day ceremonies but were turned away when they tried to get a drink later.

Victoria area branches don't extend the hat rule to include religious headgear, the legislature was told.

Cabinet minister Moe Sihota, who is a Sikh, said the Legion issue has hurt and troubled him. He noted that Sikhs wore turbans during the war, while being decorated and during a presentation to the Queen. Although the controversial rule stems from military customs in messes, he explained, Sikhs were exempt from having to remove their turbans in mess halls.

Bernie Simpson, the only Jewish MLA, represents a Vancouver riding. He said "it's incomprehensible to me that members of my community who are Orthodox and wear skullcaps could not enter certain Legion branches.

"If you draw this decision to its logical conclusion, even the Pope could not visit those branches because he would be wearing religious headgear."

Most MLAs who spoke on the issue, several of them Legion members, said branches in their home towns have relaxed the headdress rule for religious reasons.

Mazon aids 58 groups with $63,000 allocation

Donor base doubles

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mazon Canada, which bills itself as the Jewish response to hunger, has announced a springtime allocation of $63,000, up from last spring's total of $54,500.

With the current allocation, the total amount that has been distributed by Mazon since its inception in 1987 has now exceeded $530,000.

Fifty-eight organizations which feed the hungry are the beneficiaries of the current round of allocations, said Marilyn Aarons-Guttman, executive-director of Mazon Canada. Twenty-five are from Quebec and the other 33 are located in the rest of Canada. Last spring, 41 organizations across Canada received funds.

The increased allocation this spring shows Mazon is raising its profile in the Jewish community, Aarons-Guttman said. The organization's donor base has doubled in less than two years, from 2,000 to approximately 4,000, she added.

Marilyn Aarons-Guttman

As a result, Mazon's yearly allocations have risen steadily from $25,000 in its first year of operation to the 1993 total of $124,500. Aarons-Guttman said she hoped the 1994 figures would reach $150,000.

Mazon is a volunteer organization that distributes funds it has raised in the Jewish community to a variety of grassroots organizations across Canada that help to feed the hungry.

The largest single allocations in the spring round went to Bikur Cholim and to Tomchai Shabbos of Toronto. Both groups received $3,000. The Drop-in-Centre in Montreal received $2,500 while Mattan Basaiser Ezras Noshim, Tomchei Shabbos, Bikur Cholim and B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation in Montreal all received $2,000.

Other receipients include the Antigonish Community Food Banks Society in Antigonish, N.S. ($500); Atelier R.A.D.O. Inc. in Edmunston N.B. ($1,000); Fort McMurray (Alta.) Food Bank ($1,500); and the Juan de Fuca Community Resource Society in Victoria, B.C. ($1,500).

Mazon also announced the appointment of five new members to its 20-member board. The new directors are Ruth Batshaw, a community volunteer from Montreal; Susan Davis, national director of the Jewish Immigration Aid Services in Toronto; Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of the Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto; Rabbi Leigh Lerner of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom in Montreal; and Miriam Wyman, a consultant and activist from Toronto.

Peterson, Koschitzky receive Jerusalem Awards

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "The Palestinians should not even dream that Jerusalem will be the capital of a Palestinian state," Israel's consul-general in Toronto told this year's presentation of the Canadian Zionist Federation's Jerusalem Awards.

A tough-talking Dror Zeigerman pledged that Jerusalem "cannot be the capital of two states and two national entities. . . As a capital city, Jerusalem is already taken by Israel, rightfully and lawfully, politically and historically."

Zeigerman joined a who's who of the Jewish community at the Primrose Club last week to present this year's Jerusalem Award — given annually on the anniversary of the city's reunification following the Six-Day War — to Liberal MP Jim Peterson and community activist Julia Koschitzky.

Responding to suggestions that Israel will come under pressure to compromise on Jerusalem, Zeigerman pledged that "Israel will never, and could never, compromise on Jerusalem. If we compromise on Jerusalem, we lose our Zionist identity and our right to exist as a Zionist and Jewish state.

"When it is question of an issue that is fundamental to a nation's identity, we can say no to world opinion and no to world pressure," he stated.

"The Palestinians and the Arab people will understand this position better if they will know that the people of Israel will not support any government which will be ready to compromise on Jerusalem," Zeigerman added.

"Jerusalem was never the capital of any Arab nation. It has never been the capital of any nation except the Jews."

The consul general praised the recent unveiling by Canada and Israel of a joint $6-million research and development fund for high-tech ventures, and called for a free trade deal between the two countries.

Both award recipients were lauded for their contributions to Israel and the Jewish community.

Koschitzy is world chair of Keren Hayesod's board of trustees and a past president of United Israel Appeal of Canada, among other accomplishments.

Peterson, the member for the Toronto-area riding of Willowdale and its sizeable Jewish population, has long been a presence on the Jewish scene.

He's a vice-chair of the Parliamentary Friendship Group for Israel and was active in the struggle for Soviet Jewry.

He was presented the award by Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Synagogue.

In his sometimes emotional remarks, Peterson recalled a trip he and other activists made to the Soviet Union in 1983, when they visited 71 Refuseniks "and we were followed by the KGB the whole time."

He too called for a free trade deal between Israel and Canada.

Koschitzky, who received her award from Canadian Zionist Federation president Kurt Rothschild, said she had returned from Jerusalem the day before, just as Israel was marking the arrival of the 500,000th immigrant from the former Soviet Union.

Droege's bailiff license revoked

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Wolfgang Droege's woes continue to mount.

Two weeks ago, a Federal Court judge found the white supremacist leader of the Heritage Front in contempt of court for offering telephone hate messages.

Last week, the Commercial Registration Appeal Tribunal (CRAT) released its March 25 decision in which it upheld a registrar's decision under the Bailiffs Act to revoke Droege's license to carry on business as a bailiff. In its judgment, the appeal tribunal employed scathing language, saying Droege deliberately attempted to mislead the Registrar about his previous criminal convictions.

"Droege could not pass on to the Registrar honesty and integrity he did not possess," the decision states.

Referring to his failure to disclose several U.S. convictions for offences that included carrying a concealed weapon on a plane, the tribunal stated that "implicit in the offences is the possibility of violence.

"The tendency for violence is an invidious companion for a bailiff whose employment must on occasion subject him to certain risk. . . If honesty and integrity are expected of an individual permitted to carry out the duties of enforcing the law, then Mr. Droege must be found to be inadequate and without the capacity to fit that requirement. His past behavior militates against any other finding."

The decision means his employment as a bailiff with Accurate Bailiff Service, where he worked under Alan Overfield, came to an end in March.

In reaching its decision, CRAT reviewed Droege's criminal record, including a July 1, 1981 conviction in the United States for participating in an expedition to overthrow the government of Dominica. He received a three-year sentence.

"He was subsequently convicted in the State of Alabama on Feb. 19, 1985 of trafficking in cocaine and given 10 years in prison and a term of three years special parole. Further charges in the same court dealt with illegal entry into the United States and carrying a concealed weapon on an aircraft in flight. For these offences, he received two years and one year consecutive sentences."

Canadian Jewish Congress applauded CRAT's decision.

"Droege is a racist agitator," said Gerda Frieberg, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "He clearly had no right to be a bailiff charged with enforcing certain laws of this land."

Frieberg explained that Congress staff were surprised to learn more than a year ago that someone with Droege's criminal record could be employed as a bailiff.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress, said the Jewish organization complained to the Registrar about Droege's license.

"Going after him was part of our strategy to use every legal means possible to assure that neo-Nazis and hatemongers do not get any foothold in this country," Frieberg said.

"We will use any means within our democratic arsenal to effect this strategy. It's slow, but eventually it works," she added.

According to a spokesman for the Registrar's office, Droege's file was re-opened in February 1992 after an article ran in the Toronto Sun that outlined his criminal record. She said complaints from human rights advocates may have played a part in opening the case as well.

Droege will be in court again on June 22 when he will be sentenced on the contempt offence. He faces a possible one-year jail sentence.

CHRC focuses on hate lines

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A pledge to investigate telephone "hate lines," was given here recently by Maxwell Yalden, head of the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC).

"If told of one, we will monitor it, and if they are spreading hate we will go after them," he told a meeting while on a visit to Toronto from Ottawa.

He said that sometimes it is necessary to involve the Canadian Criminal Code, which has provisions to use the law against any group or organization which "wilfully promotes hatred against any identifiable group."

There are seven individual hate lines operating in Toronto, he said, and with rapidly expanding technology it is quite conceivable that a hate line might at some point be based in another country to target into Canada.

"In that case, if it were coming in on-line via Bell Canada, or whoever, we could go after them," Yalden said.

He spoke of successes the CHRC has had in battling hatemongers, citing the Heritage Front in Toronto, the Manitoba Ku Klux Klan and the Vancouver-based Liberty Net.

The meeting was atttended by people from organizations and groups interested in anti-racist, equity and anti-hate activities.

Jewish refugees exited Portugal for Canada in 1944

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — While Canadians were focussed on the landing of Allied troops in France, boatloads of Jewish refugees were leaving Europe via Portugal for Canada 50 years ago under one of the few such government-sponsored programs during the war.

The Serpa Pinto made two crossings from Lisbon in the spring of 1944. Among those on the first voyage, which took two weeks over stormy seas and the constant fear of the Luftwaffe, were Charles Kon and Maurice Baron, both French nationals.

Now in their early 60s, they were boys when their families, separately, left France illegally and entered Spain — on foot — through the Pyrenees Mountains.

Kon and Baron are two of the organizers of a 50th anniversary reunion of this refugee group. They landed at Philadelphia on April 7, 1944 and arrived by train in Montreal the next day, erev Pesach, where the Jewish community held a special seder for them at the Talmud Torah then on St. Joseph Boulevard.

There were about 280 people, most originally from Western Europe, on the first boatload, they recall. The second arrived in June, but they don't know how many passengers it had. They did learn that it had a particularly rough voyage, because the ship had to dodge German submarine torpedoes. In the panic to get into lifeboats, an infant drowned.

Kon and Baron, along with Maurice Shenkier and John Margolis, are now trying to track down others who were on these voyages for the purpose of holding their first get-together sometime later this year. Having lost touch over the years, only about 20 have been tracked down in Montreal, as well as one in Toronto and a couple in the United States.

"A strong bond developed between those on the boat...Most of us fended well for ourselves and became quite comfortable. We did not become wards of the state," said Baron, a clothing manufacturer.

The refugees were brought here under an arrangement between Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Canadian government, with the Portuguese authorities' cooperation. They were admitted for the duration of the war, but in 1946 were extended landed immigrant status. Very few returned to Europe.

The two men met for the first time the night before they left from Lisbon and have been friends since.

Parisian-native Kon, the slightly younger man, recalls his trek over the Pyrenees with his parents as an adventure and his time living on the Portuguese seaside as "utopia."

"For us, there was no war," said Kon, who works for a lock manufacturer. The adults, of course, were fully aware of the risk taken. The family left Paris clandestinely in 1940 just before "Black Thursday," the first round-up of Jewish males by the French police. They made it to the mountainous border only by paying off a police officer, he said.

There were other close calls in the journey, including being arrested just over the Portuguese border. "We were taken to the nearest Spanish village; there was one policeman and no jail. He said he did not know what to do with us and was waiting for instructions from Madrid. After a couple of months, he told us not to tell anyone and let us go."

Baron, who hailed from Nancy in the Alsace-Lorraine region, remembers that his family, which was wealthy, lost virtually everything when they fled. They were Zionists and religiously observant.

Their mountain-crossing, undertaken in winter, was more traumatic. One woman had to have her legs amputated because they froze.

His family remained in Spain, for two years in a Pyrenees village and later in Barcelona, where they tried to obtain a visa to the United States. They would settle for Canada, a country they knew little about. "All I knew was Nelson Eddy and Jeanette Macdonald and Eskimos," Baron said.

Both the Kons, who were "pink" politically and of more modest means, and the Barons eventually chose Montreal because they had heard it was French-speaking. Ironically, both men's main language today is English, because when they arrived the French Catholic schools were closed to them and they finished their education in the Protestant system.

Although Spain was led by fascist dictator Francisco Franco who aided the Axis, it was easier to enter than neutral Switzerland, whose borders were sealed. The Joint Distribution Committee had an office in Barcelona that was aiding Jews on the run.

According to Baron, Jews could stay in Spain if they "kept a very low profile. There was no religious expression...Franco told Hitler 'there are no Jews in Spain'."

The danger was ever-present in the form of pro-fascist street rallies.

Portugal was neutral, but dictator Antonio de Oliveira Salazar gave the Allies naval and air bases after 1943.

The Jewish refugees lived freely in Portugal, but could not work, Kon said. The government concentrated their swelling numbers in a coastal resort town called Ereicera, about 60 km north of Lisbon, putting them up in the tiny cottages rented for holidays. Although the accommodation was primitive, they did receive the services of a maid morning and night.

The Kons lived there for 1½ years, until a CJC representative visited the colony, informing them of the opportunity to come to Canada, from which they hoped they could enter the United States.

Baron, at least, quickly soured on the American dream, when the Serpa Pinto passengers were "quarantined like animals" and denied permission to stay anytime in the United States, despite their papers. By contrast, the group was warmly welcomed in Montreal, with each family being taken under the wing of a local Jewish family. "I remember a man gave my brother and me five dollars. But we were very proud and at first refused it, even though we had nothing."

Jewish and Sikh leaders to fight Legion decision

But five Sikh veterans denied entrance to a Legion branch in Surrey, B.C., last Rememberance Day are filing a formal complaint with that province's human rights commission, said Gian Singh Sandhu of the World Sikh Organization (WSO).

Sandhu, senior policy advisor to the organization representing Canada's 300,000 Sikhs, said the veterans will receive legal and moral support from Congress and the WSO. Both groups urged others who have been barred to come forward "so we may provide similar assistance."

Between five and 10 per cent of the Legion's 1,750 branches do not permit turbans and kippot to be worn, said Abella. Many of those branches are in western Canada. But Abella said he did not know of anyone wearing a kippah being denied entrance to a Legion hall.

The two groups also called for every province to adopt the British Columbia Legislature's condemnation of the Legion decision, and for a government boycott of those branches that discriminate.

The Sikh and Jewish leaders met eight days after delegates to the Legion's Calgary convention voted three to one against permitting religious headgear in the branches. The delegates said heads must be bare to show respect for fallen comrades. Each branch will now set its own policy.

League awards citations

Earlier, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada awarded citations to the Legion's Ontario Command and to Toronto's General Wingate branch for allowing "the full participation of Jews and Sikhs without prejudice."

Speaking at the Wingate lodge on Eglinton Avenue West, B'nai Brith's Frank Dimant congratulated the mainly Jewish branch for overlooking religious differences and "keeping the faith."

In a less well-received speech, Legion district commander Martin Venman suggested Sikh veterans form their own branches.

"We have different ethnic branches," Venman said. "What is wrong with the Sikh community forming a Legion of its own?"

Sikh lawyer T. Sher Singh responded that Sikhs do not want to be segregated. "They are Canadian and believe all institutions must treat and welcome all Canadians equally," he told Venman.

The human rights citations were presented by Rochelle Wilner of B'nai Brith. League for Human Rights director Karen Mock promised similar commendations for any Legion branch in the country that championed human rights.

After the presentation, Syd Sears of the Wingate Branch told reporters he thought the headgear issue had been "blown out of proportion to what it should be." He did not clarify his statements.

Cases to be appealed

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The cases of from 50 to 100 Russian Jewish families facing deportation will be appealed on the grounds that they face persecution or infringement of their human rights. Their cases will go before a new review unit set up by Sergio Marchi, minister of Employment and Immigration.

"We are hoping there will be a favorable decision for some, particularly in view of the unsettled conditions in republics of the former Soviet Union," said Perry Romberg, executive director, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

A favorable result cannot be expected in all cases, Romberg said, because some were rejected before the Feb. 1, 1993 date announced by the minister as eligible for the new review.

The move to broaden and relax the regulations under which failed refugee claimants can be considered for landed immigrant status was hailed as a progressive step by Romberg. At least 15 to 20 of the cases being put forward by JIAS have a good chance of having their deportation orders reversed, he said.

The new unit was set up by Marchi after he commissioned a report by Susan Davis, national director of JIAS, and Lorne Waldman, a Toronto immigration lawyer. The report blasted the present system of reviewing deportation appeals as lacking compassion and humanity, and being too "narrow" in scope, permitting only five per cent to be successful.

The cases to be reviewed must be presented by August 1, Romberg said. "After that, we'll have a better idea of what chances our families have of being allowed to stay."

The opportunity to present evidence of continuing anti-Semitism in the former Soviet Union, of dislocations as a result of the new market economy, and of oppression against minority groups is very important, the JIAS director said.

"Law and order is not a feature of the new Russian republics," he said.

Despite an increase in the number of Soviet Jews refused refugee status in the past year, there is still a significant number of Soviet Jews being admitted to Canada under a point system of skills, who do not have to qualify as refugees. A total of 2,500 Russian Jews were admitted to Canada last year, 1,500 of them coming to Toronto.

"The challenge for JIAS is to open up employment opportunities for these immigrants in smaller centres in Canada," Romberg said.

'Soviet' emigration still major theme among fundraisers

Rescue and settlement

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) in the United States has declared a close to its Operation Exodus campaign — the four-year drive to raise money for the settlement and integration in Israel of Jews from the former Soviet Union — Canadian fundraisers caution that Operation Exodus is over in name only.

Contributors to UJA, Combined Jewish Appeal and United Israel Appeal campaigns in Canada are still being asked to boost their donations to reflect the growing needs of immigrants to Israel and those still not ready to emigrate, Canadian officials say.

If anything, the number of immigrants from the former U.S.S.R. has increased dramatically since Operation Exodus kicked off in early 1990 with, in retrospect, tepid projections on immigration.

Four years ago, Israel was predicting an influx of roughly 5,000 immigrants per month from the Soviet Union.

Operation Exodus was conceived of as a three-year campaign to raise $420 million (U.S.) for the 200,000 Jews expected during that period.

But as the newcomers poured in — some 185,000 arrived in the first year alone — Exodus's goal was doubled.

Doubled too were the projections on the number of immigrants. An average 9,000 have arrived per month. Last week, Israel marked the arrival of the 500,000th immigrant from the former Soviet Union since the gates opened in 1989.

In all, Operation Exodus raised about $900 million worldwide, short of its revised $1 billion goal.

A total of $95 million came from Canada, with Toronto raising $50 million, Montreal $30 million and the rest of the country tallying $15 million.

Toronto's total meant its Jewish community was number one in the world in per capita donations from large Jewish centres.

Meantime, the immigration rate has tumbled to a current 60,000 a year — the same figure that was used to launch Exodus with so much fanfare over four years ago.

But money for Exodus continues to arrive at UJA and other campaigns as donors pay off their three-year pledges.

According to Mark Gryfe, director of UJA in Toronto, Jewish immigration from the former Soviet Union remains a central theme, and UJA from now on will fold its Operation Exodus themes of rescue and settlement into its regular campaign.

He said there's much work to do, namely, in helping Israel fund its 31 offices and 71 shlichim (emissaries) now scattered throughout the former U.S.S.R., teaching Hebrew, Zionism and running programs.

An estimated one-million Jews in Russia and the republics still hold invitations from Israel, and many could leave as the situation in their homelands deteriorate, Gryfe said.

The goal now, said Steve Ain, national director of United Israel Appeal of Canada, is to "incorporate the idea of Operation Exodus into our regular campaigns."

Here's a novel twist: UJA solicits Shimon Peres

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — In an example of the traditional Israel-Diaspora relationship being turned on its head, Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres was solicited for a contribution when he concluded addressing the United Jewish Appeal here late last month.

UJA executive vice-president Brian Lurie made a quiet pitch for no less than $10 million (U.S.), to be allocated by the Israeli government to help send 50,000 American Jewish teenagers to Israel each summer.

The $10 million would constitute a third of a $30 million "megafund," Lurie said in his opening address to the United States' UJA National Campaign Conference, held here in late May.

The other partners of this nascent fund would be the Jewish Agency for Israel — the major recipient of UJA funds in Israel — and Diaspora Jewry.

In launching the idea of a $30 million fund, the UJA is upping the ante in its effort to make a trip to Israel a universal rite of passage for every North American Jewish teenager.

"This would be like a beacon, a galvanizing force to bring this Jewish continuity issue to the fore," said Lurie.

At the same time, it reflects an era when UJA leaders feel that the relationship between American and Israeli Jews has moved from one of donors and recipients to one of partnership. And in that case, the question is shifting from what American Jews can do for Israel to that of what Israel can do for American Jews.

"Fifty years ago, Israel needed us. Today, we need Israel," said Richard Pearlstone, UJA's new national chair in the United States.

Currently, the UJA is in the middle of a three-year, $750,000 commitment, together with the Charles R. Bronfman Foundation and other Jewish organizations, to promote local pilot programs encouraging Israel trips for American Jewish youth.

Lurie and other leaders of the national program are excited by the several million-dollar gifts received to sponsor events promoting travel to Israel by teenagers and to provide trip subsidies.

"It's an opportunity for givers interested in the youth arena," Peter Gefen, director of the CRB Foundation's Israel Experience program, said at the UJA conference.

Lurie said that discussions of the $30 million fund are only at a preliminary stage. While the Jewish Agency share represents UJA money, the Diaspora share might come from other earmarked philanthropic gifts.

Lurie described it as a "renewable" fund. Whether it would be designed to last one year or five is something not yet decided.

Lurie has already had several discussions with Israeli leaders about the fund. His brief conversation with Peres at the campaign conference was only a reminder, he noted.

The proposal has also been raised with Israel's ministries of tourism and finance, as well as with the Prime Minister's office, according to Menachem Revivi, head of the Joint Israel Office of the UJA, Council of Jewish Federations and the United Israel Appeal.

Israelis not welcome in Jericho

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERICHO — For an Israeli travelling to Jericho these days, two things are clear: One is that Israelis are not welcome. The other is that the Israel Defence Force still exercises ultimate control over the area.

On the way to Jericho, our car was stopped twice at army checkpoints — both times by Israeli soldiers. Jericho's Palestinian police, stationed at a checkpoint one kilometre beyond the Israeli one, didn't even look at the car as we drove past them into the city.

Palestinian police are not allowed to stop vehicles with Israeli licence plates, according to the Cairo agreement. And so, one Israeli car after another whizzes past the Palestinian police.

The Israeli driver ahead of us was forced to turn back. Not by Palestinian police, but by an Israeli soldier at the IDF checkpoint.

"He wanted to visit the city," explained the soldier. "Israelis are no longer allowed to do that."

Indeed the rules — issued by the army 10 days after self-rule went into effect — are unambiguous. "It is forbidden to visit Jericho," says the Hebrew-language leaflet of instructions distributed at the IDF checkpoint.

Israelis are allowed into Jericho for one purpose alone: to pass through the city on their way to other destinations. This is still the quickest route from Jerusalem to Tiberias. Although a road bypassing Jericho has been opened, it is a precarious dirt road (until now used by army jeeps) and it lengthens the journey considerably.

Israelis may drive through Jericho, but cannot stop within the city or veer off Route 90, the main road. It is the IDF soldier who informs the driver of the rules; remember, the Palestinian police are not allowed to stop Israeli-licensed cars.

On the other hand, the Israeli soliders may — and do — stop every vehicle. They can question the driver and search the car for arms. The army can still close off the entire city as it did recently, after Palestinian police violated the rules of the agreement by detaining several Israelis.

Although the Israeli and Palestinian flags flutter side by side at the checkpoint, the spirit of coexistence is not much in evidence here.

"We don't have anything to do with them," said an Israeli soldier at the checkpoint. "They're terrorists." The other soldiers nodded in agreement.

The Palestinian police are equally unenthusiastic about the new arrangement. "We don't want the Israeli soldiers here, but we had no choice," said one.

IDF has own snackbars

The IDF does not allow its soldiers to eat in Jericho or wander around the city. They have their own snackbars just outside the autonomous area. One of them is run by an Israeli, the other by an Arab collaborator, according to the soldiers. "He brings us free drinks, and we look out for him," says one.

A few hundred metres down the road, the Palestinian police congregate in their own snackbar-cafe. With their Kalashnikov rifles and Palestinian decorated uniforms, they are still the object of curiosity and pride among local Jericho residents who come by to take a look or exchange a few words.

The only form of cooperation between the two sides is the one written into the agreement: the joint Israeli-Palestinian patrol. A pair of police vehicles, one Israeli, the other Palestinian, each bearing a neutral orange flag and licence plate, jointly patrol the city. If an Israeli-driven car veers off the main road or violates any other rule, the joint patrol may stop him. But only the Israeli members of the patrol may approach an Israeli driver.

At the ancient synagogue in Jericho, Jewish settlers continue to study in the newly-established yeshivah. A few weeks ago the Palestinian police chief declared they would no longer be permitted to carry guns. But most of the settlers gathered in the building recently were armed. Moreover, there were two Jewish armed guards outside the door.

A Palestinian guard is stationed at the main gate. The only control he seems to exercise is in deciding who will be allowed in to see the 1,400-year-old mosaic floor of the synagogue (which is behind a locked door in the basement of the building).

This is the only part of Jericho where an Israeli presence is felt. Everywhere else, the city, once a sleepy backwater town, is now revelling in its new role as the hub of Palestinian nationalism. Palestinian flags abound. The red, green and black colors are everywhere; even vans are spray-painted with the national colors. Equally ubiquitous is the face of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat. It greets you at every corner — on the walls of buildings, in the windows of stores, on posters, calendars and T-shirts.

Once — before the intifadah — Israelis used to visit this town frequently to have a lazy lunch under the palm trees and buy a few odds and ends. Today, it is clear they are not welcome. All Hebrew road signs have been blotted out.

Business is not great, admit the vendors and restaurant owners. Nevertheless Israeli business is not welcome — for the time being.

"We'd rather not have any Israelis here right now," said Samir, owner of a small clothing shop in the centre of town. "It's too early. We need time to get over the wounds, time to get over our pain. Maybe in the future."

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

BIEGEL — SCHEREISEN

Perhaps the most common occupation among Jews in the Ghetto was tailoring because it required a minimum of equipment.

It gave rise not only to the generic term Schneider (tailor) but also some of the equipment used in the trade. Hence the surnames:

Nadel — needle; Faden — thread; Fingerhut — thimble; Sher — shear and Biegel and Schereisen — pressing iron.

JNF maintains mission as dollars decrease

Organization's leaders meet

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Worldwide contributions to the Jewish National Fund (JNF) are not keeping up with the agency's work, Moshe Rivlin, world chairman of JNF's board of directors, warned the organization's leaders here earlier this month.

The JNF is constantly refining its mission to remain relevant and to meet Israel's changing needs, but must do so with reduced donations, Rivlin said in an impassioned address to roughly 150 delegates who gathered in Jerusalem for the World Conference of JNF Leaders.

Among them were Alan Posluns, immediate past president of JNF Canada; his wife, Sandy Posluns, a vice-president of JNF Toronto; Sid Halpern of Winnipeg, JNF Canada's incoming national president; and Avner Regev, the newly-appointed national executive vice-president of JNF Canada.

While JNF's budget for land reclamation and development has doubled in the past three years, from $64 million (U.S.) to nearly $130 million, donations dropped 11 per cent from 1992 to 1993, Rivlin noted.

While "more people are realizing that Keren Kayemeth (Hebrew for JNF) is not just [planting] trees," that realization is not being translated into donations," Rivlin added.

The drop is, in part, a reflection of profound changes in the world Jewish community, he said. The new generation of leadership increasingly views the State of Israel as "a natural existing fact and not as a miracle of the Jewish people."

This new leadership has turned increasingly inward to invest in Jewish education, he said.

The younger generation "doesn't understand what Israel means" in terms of "Jewish responsibility and security for every Jew in each community. And then people say they're concerned about Jewish continuity?"

Rivlin said Jewish education is important but should not come at the expense of Israel.

"I don't believe in education (on) Jewish continuity unless the country of the Bible and the language of the Bible is a central element of that education," he said.

Delegates to the JNF conference were occupied this year as much by questions of Jewish identity and Israel-Diaspora partnership as by the finances and achievements of the agency, which has an annual budget this year of roughly $172 million. About 22 per cent of the budget comes from worldwide contributions.

Yehiel Leket, acting chair of the Jewish Agency-World Zionist Organization, said one of JNF's biggest responsibilities is to increase its investment in education and help in the "identification with Judaism through Israel."

Education allocation

The current education allocation from the JNF's central budget is $8.7 million, up from roughly $6 million in 1992.

Whoever says Israel does not need money from world Jewry is "absolutely detached from reality," Leket said.

He said if JNF did not invest in ecology, the Israeli government would have to spend the money, taking funds away from the 600,000 Israelis who live below the poverty line.

Rivlin told delegates that JNF has not abandoned its original commitment to afforestation and land reclamation for rural settlement and agriculture.

But it has in the last few years also invested in preparing housing sites and infrastructure for the recent immigrant wave, cleaning polluted rivers, developing tourism and building reservoirs to cope with Israel's chronic water shortage, he pointed out.

And it will work with the government in its efforts to solve the problem of affordable housing in the centre of the country, Rivlin pledged.

Meanwhile, JNF is raising its international profile, delegates learned. It will host a conference on June 19 of the International Arid Lands Consortium.

More than a dozen countries will be represented at the conference, including Egypt, Kenya, Ethiopia, China and India.

Goren wants Arafat dead

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's former Ashkenazi chief rabbi Shlomo Goren last week issued a halachic ruling effectively condemning PLO leader Yasser Arafat to death.

"There is no doubt that Yasser Arafat deserves death according to Jewish and international law," Rabbi Goren said.

To support the ruling, he cited remarks Arafat made during a recent speech at a Johannesburg mosque calling for a jihad, or holy war, to "liberate" Jerusalem.

Rabbi Shlomo Goren

"As long as he (Arafat) declares jihad against the Jews and works to wrest Jerusalem from our hands, his status is like one who pursues in order to kill, and every Jew is commanded to kill him because of the verse 'don't stand idly by the blood of your neighbor.' "

Rabbi Goren's ruling was contained in an open letter signed by the Committee of Rabbis of Judea and Samaria.

International law, he said, finds no difference between a man who murders with his own hands and one who heads a terrorist organization that kills people.

He also addressed the question of whether Arafat must first be put on trial or whether his life may be taken by anyone who has the opportunity to do so.

For Rabbi Goren, the answer is clearly indicated in Jewish sources. He described Arafat as a "rodef" — one who pursues or persecutes — because of his call for a jihad.

Rabbi Goren called Arafat an outlaw and added that every Jew is "commanded to kill him" without the need for a trial.

Commenting on Arafat's upcoming visit to the autonomous Jericho district, at which time he also plans to come to Jerusalem, Rabbi Goren wrote: "Every means possible must be used to prevent the master murderer from stepping upon the soil of the sacred Land of Israel. He must be prevented from sullying Jerusalem and the Temple Mount."

The rabbi added: "There is no doubt that it was forbidden for the government of Israel to sign a peace agreement with the head of the murderous organization when it is clear he has not changed his way of murder and terror, and has not canceled the murderous organization's covenant calling for the destruction of the State of Israel."

Environment Minister Yossi Sarid said Rabbi Goren is "acting crazy.

"There is no need to react seriously to his comments because his status today does not obligate one to take him seriously. So what if he said this? Many people are saying crazy things lately, this is just another example."

Earlier this year Rabbi Goren called on Israeli soldiers to disobey orders to evacuate Jewish settlements, and that observant Jews should not heed laws passed by the Knesset if they were not passed by a majority of Jewish MKs.

The rabbi was later the subject of a criminal investigation by police, but the probe was soon dropped.

In the past few weeks, a number of public figures have come out in favor of Arafat's assassination, including National Religious Party MK Hanan Porat, Jerusalem city councilman Shmuel Meir and the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

Ethiopia wants end to Israel-bound exodus

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Ethiopian government has signaled to Israel in recent days that it is no longer receptive to the systematic immigration to Israel of the Falash Mora — Christians claiming to be descendants of Ethiopian Jews.

Ethiopia has warned that Israel must stop the stream of would-be emigrants to the capital of Addis Ababa.

Hundreds of Falash Mora have immigrated to Israel over the past several months.

But recently, the Ethiopian police chief told Israel's ambassador to the country, Ori Noy, that the Falash Mora claim of Jewish lineage is a "fabrication."

Chief Hassan Shifra reportedly threatened to intervene in the situation any way his country sees fit if Israel did not take action.

The chief reportedly said that all citizens in the northern region of Ethiopia — including himself — could be considered Falash Mora according to the Israeli definition.

Israeli officials say the Ethiopian government is worried about the chaos and dislocation created by the steady migration of residents from the north into squalid shanty towns around Addis Ababa, from where they hope to depart for Israel.

The Ethiopian stance pits Israel's Foreign Ministry, which is apparently eager to appease the Ethiopian government, against the Absorption Ministry, which has been seeking to increase the flow of Falash Mora into Israel from the current 80 per month to 200.

Proof of Jewishness required

One Foreign Ministry official said recently that those who were closely involved with Operation Solomon — the massive airlift of some 14,000 Ethiopian Jews in 1991 — uniformly agree with the Ethiopian government.

They believe that the Falash Mora claims of Jewish heritage and their claim of belonging in Israel are "baseless."

Current Israeli policy permits the immigration of Falash Mora in humanitarian and family reunification cases.

It also permits them entry under the Law of Return if they provide proof of their Jewishness in the form of a certificate by a kes — an Ethiopian Jewish spiritual leader.

The Ethiopians do not object to the emigration on an individual basis, said an Absorption Ministry spokesman.

The Ethiopian government does not recognize the Falash Mora as a legitimate ethnic group, in part because it doesn't want a massive internal migration, he said.

Meanwhile, Absorption Minister Yair Tsaban has called for increased "sensitivity" on the position of the Ethiopian government, and has said he aims to lower the profile of the issue.

At the same time, the Absorption Ministry has been trying to put out the fires over recent news reports of a budding industry in Addis Ababa in conversion certificates forged by kessim.

The alleged problem was apparently leaked to the news media by the Foreign Ministry.

Tsaban issued a statement strongly criticizing what he called the distortions and generalizations about the Ethiopian spiritual leaders.

He added that the publicity generated by the issue damages relations between Israel and Ethiopia and can hurt the process of bringing the Falash Mora to Israel under current guidelines, he said.

Aliyah from CIS reaches half million

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency for Israel last week marked the arrival of the 500,000th immigrant from the former Soviet Union since the wave of immigration began in 1989.

In a small ceremony at the Agency, the massive influx was hailed as historic and as changing the face of Israel and the Jewish people.

Speakers touched only obliquely on some of the problems the immigrants face in the course of their absorption — a topic much on the minds of some immigrant advocates, who claim the government has failed to make absorption a high enough priority.

As a result, immigration advocates claim, the government has been unable to attract hundreds of thousands of additional Jews who remain in the former Soviet Union.

Because the various Israeli agencies responsible for immigration and absorption use different methods to calculate the flow of immigrants, it was impossible to determine with certainty who the half-millionth immigrant was.

Instead, a group of newcomers who arrived on the last plane in May was invited to symbolize the milestone.

According to a recent report by the Central Bureau of Statistics, these recent arrivals from the former Soviet Union now constitute 10 per cent of Israel's population.

The report also broke down the Russian immigrant community by profession: 57,000 were registered upon arrival in Israel as engineers; more than 12,000 as doctors and dentists; 12,000 as artists, composers, writers and journalists; and an additional 12,000 as nurses and workers in other medical-related fields.

More than 50 per cent were over the age of 15 at the time of arrival, and approximately 200,000 said they had at least 13 years of education, according to the report.

Yehiel Leket, acting chair of the Jewish Agency and World Zionist Organization, opened last Monday's gathering by citing the "tremendous and meaningful contribution" to Israel made by the influx of highly educated immigrants, despite problems some encountered while adjusting to life in Israel.

By boosting the number of Jews in Israel, it will help Israel soon to become the largest Jewish community in the world, he said.

Finance Minister Avraham Shohat called the aliyah "one of the most historic events" in Israel's history and the result of years of hard work.

In spite of the fact that not all the immigrants are working in their original professions, by most standards, the absorption has been successful, Shohat said.

At the same time, he conceded that the relatively low numbers of recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union are cause for concern.

Projections for immigration from Russia and other former Soviet states for this year stand at 60,000, down slightly from last year, and sharply down from the late 1980s and early 1990s.

Uri Gordon, head of immigration and absorption at the Jewish Agency, called for more public recognition of the achievements of the immigrants.

About three weeks ago, Gordon gave a briefing to Israel's cabinet on the dropping numbers of immigrants from the former Soviet Union and the need to improve absorption.

He said he knows "there are a lot of problems and a lot of pain" among the immigrants, but that he's confident the picture will improve "because we are very serious about absorption as part of our responsibility as a Jewish state."

At the same time, "the Jews in Russia are not rushing to come out," but have adopted a wait-and-see attitude, in part because they know the gates of Israel will remain open to them.

Nonetheless, "We have to continue to push to bring another half-million."

For his part, Natan Sharansky, the most celebrated advocate for the immigrants here, found the ceremony "meaningless," supposedly because it did not reflect the struggle to make absorption a higher government priority.

"I think everybody has ambivalent feelings," he said. "The real question is whether the half-a-million came because of the [government] efforts or in spite of the lack of efforts."

The News in Brief

Peres Under Fire Over Documents

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres last week defended the government's claim that it had published all documents relating to the agreements with the PLO, and said the dispute over an unpublished letter on the protection of Palestinian institutions in Jerusalem was a "matter of interpretation."

Likud MK Benjamin Begin continued the controversy, accusing Peres of deleting a paragraph in the version of the published letter.

Peres rejected Begin's accusations, saying the letter had been published in its entirety, as it had been sent to Norway's late foreign minister.

Peres said the letter had been sent long before the signing of the Cairo agreement and that the undertakings it contained had been included in a speech he had made to the Knesset the previous month.

Extend Autonomy, Peres Says

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres warned last week that the intifadah will resume unless the government agrees to extend autonomy to the rest of the West Bank in stage two of the PLO self-rule agreement.

During a Labor faction meeting, Peres clashed with several MKs over whether to proceed with stage two of autonomy, as set out in the Declaration of Principles.

The faction agreed to meet next week to discuss the issue at length.

"It is better to apply some of the autonomy in [all of] the territory than all of the autonomy on some of the territory," a faction spokesman who attended the closed meeting quoted Peres as telling MKs.

Labor Launches New Group

JERUSALEM — Labor Party hard-liners launched a new group last week that would limit the amount of land Israel cedes to its Arab neighbors as part of any peace package.

The group, calling itself The Third Way, held its founding congress here last Sunday, the 27th anniversary of the start of the 1967 Six-Day War.

The group seeks to provide an alternative both to dovish elements favoring a return of all or most of the land captured in the 1967 war, and to hawkish leaders who vow not to return one inch of land to Arabs.

The new group, which attracted some 1,000 people to its opening session, supports the peace process and is ready for territorial compromise.

But it stresses that Israel must retain control of the Golan Heights and the territory in the Jordan Valley north of Jericho.

Hamas to Enter Politics?

JERUSALEM — For the first time since the signing of the Israel-PLO agreement, Hamas leaders are openly saying they are considering entering the political process.

Sheikh Jamil Hammameh, a Muslim leader with links to Hamas, said the organization is examining all options and will soon determine which political strategy will serve its interest best.

In Jordan last week, Hamas spokesman Ibrahim Ghoshe was more specific, saying Hamas may form a political opposition party.

Arafat Delays Trip to Jericho

TEL AVIV — PLO leader Yasser Arafat's scheduled ceremonial arrival in the West Bank town of Jericho may not take place until the end of June or the beginning of July acccording to PLO officials. He had been scheduled to arrive last Sunday.

Arafat reportedly ordered the closing of all PLO offices in Tunis by June 15, but there have been no signs that the offices were actually closing.of this happening.

Israeli officials meanwhile are arranging to call up the maximum number of forces in preparation for Arafat's arrival, which has met with calls for protests from political, religious and settler groups.

Announcements that Arafat intends to visit Jerusalem to attend prayers at the Mosque of Omar on the Temple Mount have led to threats of massive demonstrations.

Pollard a 'Traitor': Aspin

JERUSALEM — Former U.S. Defence Secretary Les Aspin last week called Jonathan Pollard "a traitor to his country," and who spied for Israel solely for money.

Appearing at Hebrew University, Aspin said: "I think Jonathan Pollard was a traitor to his country. I think he deserved the sentence that he got. He didn't do it for Israel. He did it solely for cash. He later made up the notion that he did it for Israel. He is not a hero."

Aspin, who left office this year, recommended that Pollard serve his full life sentence, claiming he had passed on classified information from his jail cell.

Pollard was convicted of spying for Israel in 1987 and has spent most of his imprisonment in solitary confinment. U.S. President Bill Clinton denied Pollard commutation of his sentence this past spring.

German-Jewish Centre Opens

POTSDAM — Described by the leader of the Jewish community in Germany as a "milestone" in the field of Jewish education in Germany, the Moses Mendelssohn centre for Jewish Studies officially opened June 1 in this eastern German city.

Speaking at the opening ceremonies for the new centre, Ignatz Bubis, head of Germany's Jewish community, said that in light of continuing xenophobia and anti-Semitism in Germany, it was important to promote the cultural contributions of Jews.

The director of the new centre, Julius Schoeps, said the institute would help promote democracy in eastern Germany.

The centre is housed in a building that was used by the Russian KGB in the days before German reunification.

Israel Blamed For Vote Result

BUDAPEST — Hungarian political extremist Istvan Csurka, known for his frequent anti-Semitic diatribes, has blamed Israel for the Socialist victory in last month's national elections here.

"Israel directed the results of the Hungarian elections by remote control," Csurka wrote in the newspaper Magyar Forum.

Csurka's right-wing Hungarian Justice Party received only one per cent of the vote in the first round of balloting and was thus unable to win re-election to his Parliament seat.

Hungary's voters handed a stunning victory to the Socialists, which was created by the reform wing of the former Communist Party, in the May 29 elections. They soundly defeated the ruling right-of-centre Hungarian Democratic Forum, to which Csurka formerly belonged.

Newspaper Marks 2nd Anniversary

MOSCOW — A newspaper known for its anti-Semitic content recently celebrated its second anniversary with an appearance by one of the leaders of last year's violent power struggle against President Boris Yeltsin.

Ruslan Khasbulatov, the former speaker of the Russian Parliament, offered his congratulations to the Al-Kods newspaper at a Moscow event attended by about 1,000 people.

It was Khasbulatov's first public appearance since he was released from jail in February as the result of an amnesty granted by the Russian parliament.

He had been in jail for his dominant role in last October's bitter fight for control of the government, which culminated in Russian tanks firing on the parliament building.

Al-Kods, which is Arabic for Jerusalem, is published by Shaaban Khafez Shaaban, a Palestinian, and is renowned as one of the most anti-Semitic publications in Russia.

Nazi Found in Costa Rica

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica — Costa Rica's Jewish community has located a Nazi war criminal who has been living freely here since fleeing the United States 10 years ago.

Bohdan Koziy, a Ukrainian police official during World War II who was found to have shot and killed a 4-year-old Jewish girl at point-blank range, has been living in a suburb of San Jose, the capital, only minutes from the city's Jewish community centre.

Koziy, 72, escaped to Costa Rica from the United States in June 1984 after the U.S. Justice Department obtained a court order to deport him to the Soviet Union.

He had been stripped of his American citizenship in 1982 after a trial in Florida in which eyewitness testimony described his murdering a Jewish family in Ukraine, including the 4-year-old girl.

Koziy was also charged with killing Jews in the Ukrainian town of Stanislau and with lying about his wartime past when he applied for a visa in 1949 and for U.S. citizenship in 1956.

The World Jewish Congress here said it was launching a global campaign to expel Koziy from Costa Rica.

"Jewish communities in 80 countries around the world will call on the Costa Rican ambassadors in their capitals to demand an end to this intolerable situation," the WJC said in a statement.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

In this week's sidrah we are taught the laws of the classic statute, the parah adumah (the red cow). It was about these laws that the wisest of all men, King Solomon, declared: "I said I could be wise enough to understand it, but it is far removed from me."

The commentaries point out that since our sidrah begins with the words, "zos chukas haTorah" (this is the statute of the Torah), and not "zos chukas haparah" (this is the statute of the red cow), it is evident that the idea of the statute applies to the entire Torah. Certainly there are mitzvot which seem more logical than others, and the reason for obeying them is within the realm of our understanding. But the fact that we see mitzvot which apparently have no rational reasoning for their observance (their purpose only understood in relation to the Divine wisdom of the Almighty), reflects that in every mitzvah of the Torah there is an element beyond human comprehension.

Rashi comments on the first verse: "Because the Soton (Satan) and the other nations of the world taunt Israel saying, 'What is this command, and what reason is there for it?' Therefore the Torah writes the word chukah, a statute. It is a decree from Me; you have no right to criticize or question it."

One of the more widely known statutes is that of kashrut, the entire gamut of the dietary laws, not only keeping a kosher home but maintaining at all times and in all places a kosher stomach.

It is beyond the scope of this limited space to review the subject of kashrut. Great philosophers and commentaries have expounded on this topic. But one thing must be noted. As Rabbi Jacob Cohn states: "It is beyond any possibility of a doubt that this law of separate diet has done more for the preservation of the identity of the Jew, and consequently for the preservation of the Torah which represents the Jewish ideal of God and life, than any other single observance which Jews practice." (The Royal Table, p. 33).

One may argue that perhaps the Shabbat or another mitzvah may vie for the title of Rabbi Cohn's champion mitzvah, but the point is certainly well taken — keeping kashrut goes a long way in distinguishing the observant and practicing Jew from the non-observant one.

If we had asked the average Jew a century ago (and perhaps a long time after that) if he or she kept kosher, a likely answer would have been, "Of course! I'm Jewish!" For our great-grandparents, keeping kosher was as natural as the act of eating itself.

For those who are still Torah observant, there has been no change. Certainly, due to the many kashrut organizations and the automatic services of kosher butchers, the adherence to kashrut laws has never been easier. But it is the rationale and the false reasoning attributed by the non-believers that separates us.

Many who are ignorant of Torah law and genuine Jewish philosophy, or who have grown up in non-observant homes, rationalize that the laws of kashrut are archaic and quaintly anachronistic. They have been falsely taught that kashrut is an obsolete health precaution, valid in the days before refrigeration but no longer relevant. Our great teacher and prophet Moshe Rabbeinu (Moses) was presumably then a kind of early FDA administrator, and the prohibitions against eating meat and milk together, or consuming pork and shellfish, had to do with bacteria, trichinosis, sanitation or the like. This absurd explanation fits in well with all the other preposterous notions conjured up by those who sought to destroy Torah observances.

The Almighty Himself clearly enunciates the purpose of the laws of kashrut despite the fact it is within the realm of chok, a statute: "Do not contaminate your souls . . . so that you not be defiled . . . for I am the Lord your God, and you shall sanctify yourselves and be holy, for I am holy . . . for I am HaShem Who brought you out from the land of Egypt, to be to you as a God, and you shall be holy, for I am holy." (Leviticus 11: 43-46)

The essence of the Jewish people is its spirituality and holiness; within the body of the Jew resides a holy and eternal neshamah (soul). Each mitzvah serves as a constant reminder of this. The result of eating treif food is referred to by the sages as timtum halav, damaging the heart's ability to be fully sensitized and attuned to holiness.

Throughout Jewish history, the loyal Jew endured the pressures of persecution rather than eat non-kosher foods. To such a Jew there exists a religious force so deeply embedded in his or her soul that even the most delectable treif food becomes abominable. But this abomination is not rooted in the physical essence of the food. Rashi in fact quotes the Sifrah: "A man should not say 'I do not desire to eat the flesh of the swine. I do desire it. But what can I do, my Father in Heaven has so decreed it [that I may not eat of it].' "

How disappointing it is, therefore, to see each week in this very paper, which bears the name of and represents the voice of Canadian Jewry, pages full of advertisements of non-kosher establishments that openly advertise true tarfus. At the same time I must say in commending The CJN that in recent months articles of kashrut and the publicizing of kosher establishments have become much more common.

We would not receive advertisements, under the pretext of good business practices, from such establishments that physically rob or hurt their patrons. We may not do so from establishments that rob their Jewish patrons, observant or otherwise, of their spiritual well-being.

Upon accepting the Torah at Mount Sinai, the Jewish people uttered two words that reverberate to this day in our consciousness . "nassen v'nishmah — we will observe and hearken." May we merit the privilege of reaffirming this pledge and merit the Almighty's concomitant blessings of becoming "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation;" a light unto the nations, a blessing to the world. And in the great merit of the mitzvah of kashrut observance may true peace come to klal Yisrael and the entire world. Amen!

Stopped at Hebron Tomb

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Members of the Israel Defence Force (IDF) twice last Wednesday forcibly prevented would-be Jewish worshippers from entering the Tomb of the Patriarchs in the West Bank town of Hebron.

A group of about 50 Orthodox men from Jerusalem, including some 20 Ger chassidim, arrived in Hebron on Wednesday intent on praying at the Tomb, a site sacred to Muslims as well as Jews.

Their plans called for them to pray at a wall alongside the seventh step of the staircase leading from the street into the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

But the IDF — which had declared the site a "closed military area" in the wake of the Feb. 25 Hebron massacre — prevented the group from praying at their chosen spot.

A similar attempt was made later in the day by a group of women settlers from Kiryat Arba, who also sought to pray at the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

They, too, were removed from the site, this time by female soldiers.

Can Yitzhak Rabin deliver what he promised?

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

My last column recorded the prevailing doubts over Yasser Arafat's willingness — and ability — to play the part he committed himself to, when he signed the Declaration of Principles in Washington. Let us now look at the Israeli scene, which unlike the inscrutable Arab world, is more transparent. The flow of information and speculation here is endless, but also quite confusing.

Yitzhak Rabin did not look too enthusiastic when he had to shake Arafat's hand, but would not have come to Washington unless he was determined to test a new course for peace. Back in Israel, he successfully mobilized the support of the majority of the public for his choice. To keep the peace process alive, he made concessions to the Palestinians despite the incongruous behavior of Arafat in all the subsequent rounds of negotiations. He controlled his temper when faced by the frequent efforts of the official Opposition to weaken his government and reacted stoically even to the very vulgar and insulting provocations of the extremist right-wing fanatics.

During all these months he was criticized by many of his own supporters both for adopting a policy of benevolent tolerance vis-a-vis the initiators of incidents as long as they were Jewish, as well as for the collective punishments he inflicted on the Arabs after every act of terrorism and instigation of violence. And he was careful not to antagonize the settlers' community as a whole, although the most virulent opposition to his policy comes from their ranks, perhaps because he knows many of them had moved to the territories encouraged by the various Israeli governments, including the one presided over by him in the early '70s.

Rabin also remained committed not to dismantle any Jewish settlement in the territories during the interim autonomy period and true to the principle that even the most exposed and isolated settlements, however small, must be defended against terrorist attacks whatever the human and financial costs of this committment. This concept is also anchored in the "understandings" with the PLO. The Palestinian police, now in place in Gaza and in Jericho, is expected to assist in the prevention of such attacks.

Yeshayahu Anug

A typical example of the price of maintaining this principle is the situation in Hebron, where after the mosque massacre a handful of Jewish fanatics are still shielded from the hostile Arab population of 130,000 by a significant contingent of Israeli soldiers and security personnel. Despite all these provisions and the presence of a number of helpless international observers, bloody incidents are frequent. In the centre of the Gaza Strip are two isolated Jewish settlements guarded by troops more numerous than their inhabitants.

How long can this policy continue? Now the prime minister seems to have second thoughts. In an almost unnoticed appearance he said recently that the blood of Israeli soldiers is now being shed for no other purpose "than that to rule over another people" and expressed the hope that the IDF "will soon cease to be an army of occupation." He also directed a few unflattering remarks at some members of the Opposition who insist that a few religious students must continue their studies in a building in Jericho, "which became a yeshivah only after the peace agreement."

These were unprecedented remarks and the question arises why he, who is responsible for this policy and could change it, does not act according to what transpires from what he says. One answer may be that he regards the costs of a drastic change to be politically unbearable at home for the time being. On the other hand, the present situation exposes settlers and soldiers alike to frequent terrorist attacks. These are generally followed by Israeli repression and the cycle of violence never stops.

News from the other "peace fronts" are no less confusing. No tangible developments can be reported on the simmering Syrian-Israeli contacts and the formal talks, interrupted in February after the Hebron massacre, are still to be renewed. Moreover, the situation in the northern sector is also directly affected by the activity of Hezbollah in Lebanon. The recent massive raid against a Hezbollah training camp was militarily very impressive. But considering the close vicinity of that objective to the Syrian border, it was also an act of brinkmanship of unforeseeable consequences.

The Syrian reaction was muted and instant Hezbollah revenge was at least discouraged, reportedly due to Syrian and maybe even Iranian pressures. There are several possible speculations regarding this Syrian attitude. President Hafez al-Assad is either not ready now to risk a major military clash with Israel or maybe he used the opportunity to signal to the international community and to the Americans that his determination to seek a peaceful solution of the conflict is strong and dictates restraint even in the face of provocation. Time will tell.

Either explanation leaves the ball in Israel's court and Rabin will have to decide how to continue the play. The feeling is that a clear Syrian call for peace directed at Israel's public, even if less spectacularly staged than the one launched by the late Anwar al-Sadat in 1977, could dissipate part of the Israeli distrust in peace with Syria without the Golan. But such a gesture is not in the nature of the Syrian leader and may never come. However, a formula for a gradual arrangement with Syria is in an advanced state of gestation. Its costs for Israel are both politically and militarily higher than they are for the Syrians and so is the risk factor.

American Secretary of State Warren Christopher will probably come to the area soon with the declared purpose of encouraging the two parties to continue their efforts, which he described as "serious." Israel will have to decide what it wants to pay for an understanding with Damascus. The present status quo cannot be maintained very much longer, without the risk of a major regional deterioration. Furthermore, Syria holds the key for the peace arrangements in all other sectors. No Israeli-Palestinian accord can hold without Syrian acquiescence.

Right now Rabin's agenda is replete with a number of internal issues, on which sound decision-making is urgently required. First amongst them is the near collapse of the health system. But overburdened as he may be with this issue and many others, he'll have to make up his mind how to continue the peace process and let the nation know. As his government is already two years old, he has but one year to act; 1996 is election year both here and in the United States and hardly suitable for judicious reflection.

Yiddish language starting to return to Israel

By SHELLEY KLEIMAN
(World Zionist Press Service)

One of the casualties of Israel's struggle for independence was Yiddish, the language that nurtured the spiritual and intellectual life of Eastern European Jewry until the eve of the Holocaust. Many Zionist leaders considered Yiddish the language of the Diaspora, of the ghetto, and of right-wing orthodoxy. It was therefore a threat to the revival of Hebrew and the rebirth of the Jewish people in their ancient homeland. It was the antithesis of everything they were striving to create. Israel's first prime minister, David Ben Gurion, called it a "nerve-wracking, alien language."

Forty-six years later, in what might be considered an indication of the nation's self-assurance, there is growing interest in Yiddish. Courses are flourishing in elementary and high schools, as well as community centres and universities throughout Israel. But in an ironic turn of events, the language of instruction is now Hebrew.

"To my parents' generation, Yiddish was an embarrassment," says Nathan Cohen, a doctoral candidate and language instructor in the Department of Yiddish Studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Although both his parents are Israeli-born, Cohen heard Yiddish at home from his maternal grandmother, who immigrated to Palestine from Poland in 1906. From her, he developed a passion for the language.

Cohen delights in introducing Yiddish to his students. "Most are surprised by the richness of the language," says Cohen. The secular culture — the literature, theatre, press — that flowered in Eastern Europe, he says, comes as a shock to students whose meager association with Yiddish is limited to Fiddler on the Roof and a few caustic remarks. To many, Yiddish is a dying language with little more than sentimental and nostalgic overtones.

Why, then, are increasing numbers of Israelis of all ages, returning to Yiddish?

"The reasons are hard to pinpoint," says Professor Chava Turniansky, acting head of the Yiddish Department. Some simply wish to fulfil a degree requirement or to facilitate research in the Holocaust and other areas of Jewish history.

But others' reasons go far deeper. The roots of the language can be traced back some 1,000 years — the earliest written document is dated in the 11th century — and for centuries Yiddish was the common denominator uniting Jews in many parts of the world.

Some recall hearing Yiddish at home, for others, Yiddishkeit simply entered their collective Jewish consciousness. "It is part of our neshamah" (soul), says Daniel Jolay, chair of Yiddish Lovers — The Second Generation, a non-profit, Israel-based organization which promotes Yiddish clubs throughout the country.

Many Yiddishists cite the search for roots during the 1960s and '70s in America as the catalyst that got things rolling. This ethnic impulse, coupled with the growing realization of all that the Holocaust had destroyed, spurred interest in Yiddish in universities and adult education programs.

The most dramatic shift in Israel can be seen in the school system. Today 3,000 pupils, from third through twelfth grade, are studying Yiddish in 52 schools — both religious and secular — throughout the country.

Integral part of school system

"Eight years ago, only three schools offered Yiddish," says Mordechai Dunetz, supervisor of Yiddish instruction at the Ministry of Education, and the man who most single-handedly effected this change. "Yiddish is now an integral part of the school system. There is even a bagrut (matriculation exam) available in Yiddish."

Yiddish is offered as an elective foreign language ("ludicrous calling it a foreign language," says Dunetz), and either parental request or a principal's own initiative brings it to a classroom of Ashkenazi and Sephardi pupils. School-age children, says Dunetz, are totally unaware of its cultural importance. "I like the way it sounds. I like the songs," offered a third grader in a Jerusalem school.

And it is primarily through song, drama and folktale that children are introduced to a world that is no more. For them Yiddish is not presented as a dead language. With the basics under their belts, pupils visit hospitals and nursing homes to converse with senior citizens in a language that almost speaks for itself.

While Yiddish remains the spoken idiom in certain ultra-Orthodox communities, and Yiddish words and phrases have become incorporated into everyday speech, it is unlikely, even unthinkable, that Yiddish will ever become the vernacular it once was. "This renewed interest in Yiddish is nothing like a renaissance.," says Turniansky. "That," she adds grimly, "would imply returning to what existed before the Holocaust."

Adult education classes and Yiddish-speaking clubs notwithstanding, the university seems the most likely bastion for preserving Yiddish. And judging by the number and size of classes in Israel, there is room for optimism.

All the major universities offer language courses in Yiddish, which many students take after completing the highly popular introductory courses in Yiddish culture, taught in Hebrew. But few students — perhaps three or four every year at Hebrew University — choose to major in Yiddish.

Bar Ilan University in Ramat Gan has a special teacher training program for elementary and high school teachers of Yiddish, and the Hebrew University has a renowned research-oriented department — the only independent Yiddish department in the world.

Latvian-born Yiddish teacher Michael Bordin's enthusiasm is infectious. In his three beginners' classes at Hebrew University, the approach is no-frills, straight grammar — one way, he says, to weed out the less serious students. Instead of producing yawns and absenteeism, a determined sense of camaraderie prevails, as students enthusiastically conjugate verbs and practise their tenses.

The class is a heterogeneous mix of young and old (one woman is a mother of seven, and grandmother of five), native Israeli and immigrant — even Jew and non-Jew. However, the majority of the students — despite media focus on a handful of Japanese and Yemenite students learning Yiddish — are Ashkenazi.

Rachel, a doctoral student of chassidic music at Hebrew University, says her degree gives her the perfect opportunity to learn Yiddish, and Leah talks of the need to translate more Yiddish literature into Hebrew. "If not, the next generation will know nothing of the Yiddish language's rich past."

Michael, a combined music and Yiddish major, immigrated to Israel from Russia three years ago. It was his childhood dream to learn Yiddish, he says. Having settled in Israel and mastered Hebrew, Michael's dream is now becoming a reality. What would Ben Gurion say now?

The Rebbe, ז"ל

The Lubavitcher Rebbe was an extraordinary man. He engendered great love among his more than a quarter million followers, hostility among some elements in the fervently Orthodox haredi community, and wide, almost reverential respect among both Jews and non-Jews alike.

Politics and theology aside, the chassidic world of the Rebbe was essentially an inclusive one. It spoke to the secular as well as to the observant Jew. It espoused full involvement in the modern world. It included Zionism and military service in the IDF. And it drew no distinctions among the countless Jews, however far-flung, whose spiritual or physical "rescue" was always its first priority.

Menachem Mendel Schneerson was the most prominent Jewish religious leader in the world. For 43 years he led the Lubavitcher Chassidim as their seventh Rebbe. During that time he revived the remainder of the Lubavitch community which came to America in 1940, and nurtured it into the strong, global movement which today claims more than 250,000 adherents. Some 3,000 shlichim or emissaries of the Rebbe run nearly 1,600 different religious and social service facilities around the world, from Montreal to Madrid, from Melbourne to Moscow.

The Rebbe's home and Lubavitch head office in Crown Heights became a meeting ground and often a personal crossroads for thousands of Jews, young and old, secular and religious. He drew scores of Jews back to their people.

The impact of the Rebbe's brand of visible Judaism has been noted throughout the Diaspora and Israel. In North America his policies have had a positive ripple effect on Jewish life. Writing recently in the Jerusalem Report, Yossi Klein Halevi stated that "the Rebbe built Lubavitch into the most powerful chassidic movement in history ... Tens of thousands around the world feel and act a little more Jewish because of him; no one else comes close to that achievement."

There is no denying the Rebbe's role in making people throughout the world more aware of their Judaism. In a post-Holocaust world, he brought a bold, confident, self-assured face to Judaism. He spread that Judaism into scores of searching Jewish hearts. And he extended the Jewish world into the farthest corners of the globe.

And he did so with wisdom, understanding and knowledge.

The Rebbe's passing is a loss we will all mourn.

May his righteous memory be for a blessing.

Zichrono tzadik livrachah.

A disconcerting poll

It was very fashionable in recent years to dismiss Arab anti-Semitism as an unfortunate by-product of the Arab-Israeli imbroglio. In this scenario the systematic teaching of contempt for Jews, Judaism and the State of Israel was a kind of war propaganda .

It has now been nine months since Israel and the PLO signed Declaration of Principles (DoP) in Washington. The negotiations which preceded and followed those talks have now produced a PLO presence and administration in Gaza and Jericho and an armed Palestinian police force of almost 10,000 men. The State of Israel has taken heroic risks in agreeing to this arrangement.

The question must now be asked: have Israel's bold moves towards peace — executed, it must be remembered, without the PLO's renouncing its covenant or the formal ending of the Arab boycott of Israel — diminished the virulence of its haters in Arab countries?

A partial answer to this question is found in a disconcerting poll released by Prof. Hilal Khashan of the American University of Beirut. Khashan asked 1,000 Muslim Lebanese, Syrians and Palestinians on the eve of the DoP if the Arabs are ready for peace with Israel.

The survey showed (Frontline, CJN May 26) that 75 per cent of the respondents favored immediate military confrontation with Israel. "The remaining one-fourth call for maintaining the present situation of no peace, no war, pending the time when Arabs can attain their objectives," Khashan reported. He concluded that even those who supported negotiations with Israel "are not psychologically ready for peace."

Khashan explains the results of his poll as evidence of the systematic conditioning of Arabs by their elite since the 1920s to suspect and hate Jews and to seek the destruction of Israel.

After 70 years of being exposed to hatred of Jews and Israel on a colossal scale it is not surprising that current Arab regimes find it difficult to get off the anti-Semitic and anti-Israel tracks they have been running on for so many years. Bad habits are notoriously hard to break.

This is one bad habit, however, that cannot be permitted to continue. It is time for Arab governments from Riyadh to Damascus and from Amman to Sana to reel in the nets of hatred and hostility towards Israel. A new era is dawning in the Middle East and it's time the Arab world as a whole realized this.

ALETHEA'S MARCH

I want to thank the Jewish community on behalf of my daughter for the recent March to Jerusalem.

Reluctantly, I dropped my daughter off at 8 a.m. on a dreary wet Sunday morning near the start at Mountain Sights and Westbury and had her meet with her group, "Yachad." I drove home and by 10:30 a.m. was quite nervous that she'd be complaining of "too much walking."

I got into my car and started to check at each 'city' with no sign of her. I drove through Outremont and even questioned some of the marchers. I was sure she was lost. A downpour came and I got even more concerned so I went to a security person and he used his walkie-talkie and a car came up five minutes later and I gave a brief description of my 19-year-old "challenging needs" daughter.

Someone had seen Alethea on the mountain trail.

A few minutes later, I was told she was with two volunteers at Queen Mary Road and Ponsard near Haifa, 13 kms. from the start. When I met up with her, she insisted she should continue so I drove slowly and just watched. But by Felix and Norton, she quit!

She adored the two dressed up cookie makers, but was wet and exhausted. She kissed her helpers goodbye and we drove through the rest of the march. My daughter got out at each city to get her book stamped. She was indeed proud to raise a little over $38.

UNITED NOTHINGS

How can the world stand still and not do anything for the people of Rwanda?

The noon TV news on June 2 showed the faces of those children who are fearful of being systematically murdered.

Which countries are selling armaments to the combatants?

If the United Nations cannot do anything, then it was just hypocritical to send them there.

In Israel they were called the United Nothings.

WHERE ARE ARAB SHEIKHS?

If lack of financial support leads to the collapse of self-government in Gaza and Jericho the results would be disastrous for the entire Middle East peace process. The necessary success in Gaza and Jericho is the very foundation of future stability and mutual cooperation.

Just as Jews in the Diaspora have rallied behind Israel both morally and financially since 1948, so Arabs throughout the world must help build a stable Palestinian entity. Where is the extraordinary wealth of Arab sheikhs and princes at this time of urgent need? The sheer number of Arabs throughout the world makes the task attainable.

If the Arabs and their leadership fail to support the Palestinians now, it will prove irrevocably that their call for a Palestinian State over the years was nothing but empty rhetoric.

CLOSED SESSION OKAY

I am astounded to see that a Jewish publication would presume to criticize the Writers Thru Race conference to be held soon in Vancouver. Attendance at this conference is exclusive to natives and people of color. The Writers' Union, the sponsors of this conference, feels that these people have special problems in writing and getting published. So they have decided to get together to discuss interests that are special to them.

Many other groups of writers, women, blacks, and last but not least, Jews, get together in little conferences to discuss problems exclusive to their group. It does not necessarily mean that they want to widen the divisions between various ethnic and other groups in Canada. They have a specific, legitimate problem, namely writing and publishing as natives and people of color.

That seems perfectly all right to me and I cannot understand why a Jewish organization, of all people, which has these exclusive conferences of one kind or another, is objecting to the Writers Thru Race conference.

UNCLE BILL HOROWITZ

I want information about my great uncle Bill Horowitz. He emigrated to Toronto from Minsk sometime between 1900 and the early 1920s. My grandmother, Molly (Malka) Horowitz Kaminsky (who died circa 1953) was his sister. She lived in Detroit and had three children: Miriam, Michael and Isabel (all of whom are deceased). Memories of visits to the old South Africa

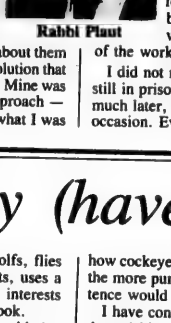
By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

During the '70s and '80s I made two lecture tours in what was then still the old South Africa: strict apartheid, drinking fountains for whites and non-whites, appalling poverty in the black townships and a bland disregard of the most elementary rights of anyone not lucky enough to be born with a white skin.

My wife and I have never been able to get over some of the incidents we witnessed. At a lovely poolside party, the head waiter was a dignified black man dressed in formal attire, clearly a competent person. But when the "master" did not find him responding quickly enough to one of his blared commands, he kicked him in front of all his guests. We left the party as fast as we could.

These particular hosts were Jewish, but let it be said that South African Jews were among the very first to work for a new community in which everyone would be treated civilly and have a chance for a decent life. Rabbi Moses Cyrus Weiler, a graduate of Hebrew Union College, was the first to establish special school and teaching facilities, and he had the full support of his congregation — though not of all of the Jewish community, who were afraid for their status. (The rabbi later made aliyah and experienced great tragedy: two sons, both officers, were killed in service.)



Rabbi Plaut

Even 20 years ago, however, the stirrings of a new South Africa could be felt, and many Jews became convinced their own position would become untenable if they "stepped out of line." I was advised not to talk about black-white issues, certainly not in criticism of state policies. But talk about them I did, by describing the new social revolution that was then going on in the United States. Mine was a strictly historical and reportorial approach — and I am sure that my hearers knew what I was talking about.

We had occasion to visit Helen Suzman, one of the great fighters for black equality. She was a Jew who put herself on the line — and history will come to recognize her place.

We had a quite unforgettable visit with Alan Paton, South Africa's foremost novelist and author of Cry, the Beloved Country. He had just built a lovely home outside Durban, and one of the stories he told us still sticks in my mind: While the building was in progress the white laborers found out they were building shower facilities for Paton's black staff. The idea that blacks should have decent facilities was simply too much for them and all of the workers left the job.

I did not meet Nelson Mandela then; he was still in prison. I had a chance to encounter him much later, when he visited Toronto on a state occasion. Everyone here and there wishes him well and hopes his conciliatory policies may have a chance of success.

The June 2 issue of The Jerusalem Report contains a fascinating article entitled Jews in the New South Africa. It is written by editor Hirsh Goodman, who was raised in South Africa:

"A disproportionate number of whites fighting apartheid were Jewish. But for many, too many, blindness was the order of the day. They led an indulged life at the expense of four out of five people in the country, something they conveniently forgot about until they had no choice. One can only hope that the blacks, now in government, will have more compassion than they received in South Africa."

Happy Father's Day (have a hankie...again)

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

I hate Father's Day. I love my father, but hate Father's Day. I never know what to get for my Dad.

For that matter, I don't know what to get for my husband, either. I would like to give him a Father's Day gift even though he's not my father. After all, it's my fault, so to speak, that he's a father at all, although that doesn't make it any easier to find a present.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

Father's Day gifts seem to fall into categories: golf clubs, fishing gifts, or clothing. No madcap whimsical presents exist in the male realm, even though it is easy to find such pleasant toss-offs for women. I can locate no knickknacks of any particular merit, few fads for fun-and-forget-it presents, and almost no items that inspire a man enough to ask for them.

Not that men ask for most of the things we give them. There is not a man on the planet who, if awakened from a sound sleep and asked, "Okay, buster, what do you really want?", would roll over and groggily confess, "A tie, I want a brand new tie."

The real problem with Father's Day isn't that gift choices are so limited. The real problem with Father's Day is that men don't want stuff. It's not just ties, they don't want anything.

Men mostly want to own less stuff, not more. And when men want something, like a shirt, they go buy it. No muss, no fuss, no gift wrap. One white dress shirt more or less doesn't seem to stir their desires.

If I ask my father what he wants for Father's Day, he'll say, "That's just a phony holiday, honey, don't worry about it." But, I worry about it. He'll say, "Don't spend your money." But, I'll spend. He'll say, "Don't go to any bother with that." But, I'll bother, and all this will take place in the fond name of being a loving — if disobedient — daughter.

It's just as bad with my husband, who has fewer hobbies than my Dad. Dad at least golfs, flies a small airplane, grows outdoor plants, uses a computer and travels. Each of those interests offers the faint possibility of a gift book.

My husband, on the other hand, snow skis (no good in June), raises small children (me too, and it's no hobby), wrestles with legal documents, exercises sporadically, and, by and large, stays home. What do you buy for someone like that? Especially for someone like that who doesn't really want anything, except perhaps a couple of evenings of peace and quiet.

It is easier for the children. Their paintings, their carefully wrought construction of popsicle sticks and clay, their printed poems are all precious gifts, unavailable in the commercial marketplace, and just right for the occasion, no matter how cockeyed they look. The younger the child, the more pure spirit matters. Technical competence would be a bonus.

I have considered falling back on the always dependable way to a man's heart: food. But, I'm not sure the perfect treat for the men in my life even exists. My husband is kosher, weight-conscious, lactose-intolerant, boycott-observant and rushed. My father avoid foods that challenge his bridgework, add sugar or fat to his system, smack of "nouvelle" in any way, or fail to appear in their natural form. He doesn't like anything molded, mashed, pureed, minced or blended. Dad likes my cooking (I think) but the first few company dinners I made after I got my food processor, I don't believe he thought anything on the table was worth eating.

But no matter how far gone I am, my Father's Day desperation has already been bested by one relative, who shall remain nameless. Several years ago, she gave her father a package of nice handkerchiefs for Father's Day. About 10 months later, she saw the still untouched box of hankies in her Dad's bureau. She nicked them, wrapped them up and gave them to him again for Father's Day that year. He loved them just as much as he had the year before. So she did it the same thing next year. And the next.

The hankies are about 10 years old now, and already freshly gift wrapped for their 1994 appearance. There's a daughter who has beaten the Father's Day rap. She knows, already, that her dad will be pleased and surprised . . . again.

Life in the CIS still far from normal

By WENDY EISEN

It's time to stop taking for granted the security of Jews in the former Soviet Union.

Since communism's demise five years ago, over half a million Jews have emigrated to Israel from Russia and the surrounding republics. With the 350,000 already there, 850,000 former residents of the region are now living in Israel. This miraculous volume of aliyah unfortunately leads many to assume that Jewish life is perfectly normal in what was once the Soviet Union. Our recent United Jewish Appeal (UJA) mission to Moscow, Tbilisi and Baku demonstrated starkly that nothing could be further from the truth.

Today in Tbilisi, the Georgian capital, educated professionals earn the equivalent of $4 a month. There is nothing to buy in the stores. Theatres and opera houses hold only matinee performances, because the city is under curfew after dark. Tbilisi, once a cornerstone of culture and intellect, is now famous for bombed out buildings and bullet-riddled walls — the remains of civil war. Some 25 per cent of the Georgian Jewish community emigrated in the past year. Only 17,000 remain.

After three years of war with Armenia, Baku, the oil rich capital of the Azerbaijan, is impoverished. Income from the country's ample natural resources is being spent on defence rather than benefiting the city's citizens.

In all the countries of the Caucasus, the story is the same — ethnic warfare, bankrupt governments, corruption, murders and kidnapping, with Jews, in many cases, the victims.

In Moscow, anti-Semitism is bubbling powerfully below the surface. On May 9, during the annual Red Army Day parade, ugly banners proclaiming that "dirty Jews are ruining Russia" and "kick the Jews out" appeared in full view. Even assimilated Jews question their future when anti-Semitism rears its head.

The Jews of Russia and the 14 neighboring republics still need our help. For them, the UJA-supported Jewish Agency is the central source of rescue.

Since the first Jewish Agency office opened in Moscow in 1990, 30 more have blossomed across the former Soviet Union. The offices are staffed by 77 men and women, many of whom were born in the U.S.S.R. These devoted emissaries come from Israel to teach Jews about Judaism, console them about their concerns and promote aliyah. For Agency officials like Lev Bardani, Baku's coordinator, the work day often ends at 4 a.m., when he oversees the safe transfer of new immigrants to Israel.

This summer, 20,000 children will be enrolled in Jewish Agency camps, and hundreds of teenagers will be arriving in Israel under the auspices of Aliyah 16. They're coming without their parents to complete their high school education, expecting to stay in Israel and, one day, reunite with their families.

As our flight from Baku disembarked at Ben Gurion Airport, we felt a sense of urgency. A shaky political climate and deteriorating conditions in the former Soviet Union could once again close today's window of opportunity. At any moment, 1.4 million Jews could quickly be subjected to totalitarianism.

This is no time for illusions. The reality is grim. There is still a Soviet Jewish crisis.

Wendy Eisen is co-chair of the 1995 United Jewish Appeal campaign, which funds the Jewish Agency for Israel. She is a veteran activist on behalf of Soviet Jews.

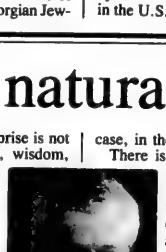
Meetings subject to natural laws and dynamics

By JACK CHISVIN

After a year of denial I have decided to come out in the open and admit that I was an addict.

During the time I served as president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, I became a meeting junkie. In the two years I attended 800 meetings; had others been willing to accommodate me I would have attended more. While I still suffer from withdrawal symptoms — awakening in the middle of the night, bathed in perspiration, heart palpitating, wondering what meeting I have missed — my addiction is behind me. I have learned to say no when invited to yet another meeting.

With the information highway at our doorstep — E-mail, cellular telephones, fax machines and the proliferation of electronic communications technology — it is paradoxical that there is still a need to attend meetings. The pervasion of meetings is like a contagious disease for which there is no immunization and once contracted no known antidote. It is a genetic disease, afflicting mostly Jews. To rise to the top of any enterprise is not so much dependent on intelligence, wisdom, cleverness or even street smarts as much as the endurance to sit through interminable meetings. Success accrues to meeting survivors — to those who have the requisite sitz-fleish.



Jack Chisvin

Meetings, regardless of their composition, purpose and agenda, are subject to certain dynamics and follow natural laws akin to both Parkinson's Law and the Peter Principle. They are convened too frequently, attended by too many and go on too long. Meetings begin, more or less, at a specific time but adjournment is unpredictable, invariably concluding with a definite maybe and a final resolution deferred to the next meeting.

Attendants at meetings can be characterized according to the behavior patterns they exhibit. There are those who immediately upon entering the room must flick the light switches and adjust the thermostats. These people, as soon as they sit down, start poking around — in their briefcase, in their pockets, in their nose.

There is another type who enters the room loudly, speaks loudly, and complains that the noise in the meeting room is too loud. Every meeting has at least one late arrival who is almost always a contrarian and is intent on reversing everything that may already have been decided. Arriving late is this person's modus operandi.

Meetings seem to attract people who believe in the transmigration of inanimate objects. They rearrange coffee cups, transfer keys and coins from one pocket to another, remove their glasses and tighten the ear piece with a nail file, then clean their fingernails with a pencil. Another phenomenon at meetings is the frequent interruption by ringing devices. If it isn't the alarm on a wrist watch, it is a cellular phone. You can differentiate the two by observing if someone starts whispering into a briefcase.

Discussion at meetings is usually monopolized by a person who, seemingly, never has enough time to get to the point. This person confuses rhetoric with persuasive debate. It is reminiscent of the lawyer who was taking so much time arguing his case that the judge impatiently asked how much longer he would be speaking. "I need just a little more time," said the lawyer, to which the judge replied, "You have already exhausted time — you are now in the realm of eternity."

The language used at meetings must be carefully interpreted. If one calls for support of a position with "it's OK," it means a catastrophe; if it's with "It's in the bag," it means a lost case. If the chair says we will dispose of this item "in short order" it means several hours. If someone undertakes to pursue a matter in "a day or two" it means a year, or if it's "after the holiday" it means you can forget it.

I overheard Rabbi Dow Marmur quoting a reliable source that meetings are the reason for such a low birth rate among Jews. Because of my own experience I believe something must be done to treat the problem of addiction to meetings. I therefore propose to organize Meetings Anonymous. To that end, I ask all like minded people to join me in a series of planning meetings. . .

Rabbi Schneerson's death saddens Lubavitchers

'We all feel that we lost a father, we feel orphaned.'

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — People were not talking much last Sunday outside Lubavitch World Headquarters in Crown Heights.

But the sound of tambourines and chants of "Melech ha-Moshiach" — the chassidic movement's call for the biblically prophesied Messiah — could be heard all along Eastern Parkway, the main thoroughfare of the Brooklyn neighborhood.

Though the movement's 92-year-old spiritual leader, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, had died of a heart attack just a few hours earlier, the determination that the Rebbe would still reveal himself as the Messiah was heard amid the prayers of mourning.

"I think the Rebbe's going to redeem us," 19-year-old Yehoshua Smukler said as he stepped away from a circle of dancing men. "He's going to get up and take us into redemption."

Others in the tight-knit community struggled silently to manage their grief among the throngs of reporters, police officers and public figures who had descended upon Crown Heights to witness the funeral that many in the movement had insisted would not occur.

Behind a maze of police barricades, hundreds of men in black fedoras lined up for a chance to pass by Rabbi Schneerson's coffin. Others prayed in the synagogue at 770 Eastern Parkway.

Upstairs at Lubavitch headquarters, where Rabbi Schneerson had managed the movement's vast network of religious outreach services, Rabbi Yehuda Krinsky spoke of an orderly continuation of the Lubavitch mission.

"We know pretty much what the Rebbe wants of us," said Rabbi Krinsky, the movement's official spokesman and a close aide to the Rebbe. He pointed out that in the 27 months since the Rebbe's first stroke, the movement had grown by 20 per cent.

"That continues," Rabbi Krinsky said quietly. "That will always continue."

But Rabbi Krinsky, his blue suit torn in mourning, also insisted that the movement be given time to sort itself out.

"We all feel that we lost a father, we feel orphaned," he said. "You should give us a chance to wrestle with that."

Rabbi Krinsky said that Rabbi Schneerson had left a will but that a successor was not named.

Satelite broadcast of Rebbe's funeral beamed worldwide

Word of the Rebbe's passing spread almost instantaneously to the movement's offices across the globe by fax, electronic mail and telephone. Television cameras crowded the Crown Heights headquarters while Lubavitch representatives in South America and Australia called to arrange live satellite hookups to the funeral.

In Kfar Chabad, the movement's stronghold near Tel Aviv, some Chassidim refused to believe the Rebbe had died, or believed that if he had, he would reappear to redeem the Jews.

About an hour after the Rebbe's death became known, a group of men gathered in a local synagogue, dancing and singing, "Long live our master, teacher, and rabbi, the King Messiah for all generations."

One of those who joined in said he was singing out of the belief that the Rebbe would "at any moment" arise and come to Israel.

But back on the street in Crown Heights, Leib Simcha Meadvin, a 30-ish man dressed in the traditional chassidic black hat and coat, said the community had been in denial about the possibility of the Rebbe's death and now does not know how to handle it.

"There's all these people running around without answers. No one wanted to think about it before, and now that they have to think about it — I don't know."

Like some others standing out in the rain on Eastern Parkway, Meadvin said that this generation simply may not have done enough to merit redemption by the Messiah.

"Maybe," he said, "we have to do more."

"Things had to come to a head either way," said Zelda Stein, a Lubavitcher from Long Island. "But now there's no one telling them what to do tomorrow, so what's going to happen then? A little bit has to fall apart, but let's see how much."

Rebbe's many qualities remembered

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The sense of personal loss was palpable, as, with their husbands, brothers and grown sons away in New York, the women of the Lubavitch movement gathered at the Lubavitch Community Centre in Thornhill to mourn the death of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

But to them he was not Rabbi Schneerson, the world-renowned religious leader. He was simply "the Rebbe," their source of guidance, inspiration and religious wisdom.

The women sat numbed, with stunned faces, many tearstained, without the heart to control their children, who ran around the room, stopping from time to time a little timidly, to stroke the women's arms, or get a fierce hug.

After the recitation of Tehillim (Psalms), people began to reminisce about the Rebbe's teachings, his prophesies, the sometimes inexplicable things he did.

They spoke about how he had promised that Israel would be the safest place to be in the Middle East during the Gulf War, and had known just when the war would end — and he was right; about his knowing someone's Hebrew name even when they themselves didn't; about his picking up a child scheduled for surgery, and the child's returning home and being told he didn't need it anymore.

One talked about how Rabbi Schneerson had encouraged women to study, not just Torah but Talmud too, and urged those present to continue studying in his memory.

Edith Hochler, a teacher at Eitz Chaim Schools, and a long-time follower of the Rebbe, called his death "shattering. I really thought he would get better. I guess I really wanted him to get better."

She said that the world will miss him just as the Lubavitch do. "He had something to say on every topic."

While saying she feels it is too soon to think about what will happen next and adding "I can't imagine life without him," she said she felt encouraged after seeing the women at the gathering.

"I can see that the work on bringing the Messiah is not going to end. That is the direction we still have to work on."

Bina Cole, a former president of the Lubavitch women's organization in Toronto, called this an "exciting and awesome time."

"We are confident, full of excitement that the process that has been taking so long and has been so painful is about to come to fulfillment. The great and awesome day (the coming of the Messiah and the rebuilding of the Temple) is at hand."

She said that it is important to realize that G-d "makes things happen when it seems impossible. I want my children to know that what is important is not what things look like. The Moshiach will be revealed."

As this paper went to press, the officials and rabbis of Toronto Lubavitch had not returned from New York, and so were not available for comment.

Rabbi Moshe Stern, issued a statement on behalf of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto:

"The Lubavitcher Rebbe was unquestionably the post-Holocaust generational leader. He had an impact on almost every Jewish soul and Jewish community in the world. His legacy can be found in the thousands upon thousands of baalei teshuvah who themselves have changed Jewish community life."

On a more personal note, Rabbi Stern added: "Having been a student of the Lubavitch yeshivah in Montreal, the Rebbe's advice to me on numerous occasions was an invaluable source of inspiration, strength and guidance."

Rabbi Howard Joseph, chair of the national religious and inter-religious affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, said that Rabbi Schneerson "will be recognized as one of the outstanding Jewish leaders of the twentieth century.

"He will be remembered for his great scholarship...and for the unusual efforts he made in reaching out to Jews throughout the world who may have become alienated from Judaism or lived in isolated Jewish communities, and in offering his emissaries to teach and guide them.

"He believed that his efforts were directed at improving the world and at preparing for the messianic era of peace between all peoples."

B'nai Brith Canada heard the news of Rabbi Schneerson's passing "with profound sadness and a sense of great loss."

On behalf of the organization, executive vice-president Frank Dimant praised him for his "commitment to the spiritual welfare of the Jewish people," his "enhancement of Jewish pride," his "devotion to rebuilding and reinvigorating Jewish life in the post-Holocaust era.

"No community was too small, no outpost of Jewish life was too remote, for him to be ready, willing and able to respond to its need. His love of all Jews and his desire for positive coexistence with the non-Jewish community was unremitting and inspiring all at once."

Numbness and grief grip Montreal Lubavitch followers

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In Montreal, the third largest North American Lubavitch centre after New York and Los Angeles, a sense of numbness and grief seemed to grip the community of 3,000 on Monday, June 13.

Rabbi Ronnie Fine, a local director of the Chabad Centre on McGill University campus reached in New York, declined to predict what the future would hold without Rabbi Schneerson.

"One thing is for sure. It was not expected," he said of the Rebbe's passing.

In Rabbi Fine's view, there would be no point to finding a successor because "there can be no successor."

"What's the point?" he asked. "Each one will [have to] be an emissary. Each individual will be a successor."

Rabbi Fine also said there will surely be a period of "soul searching" within Lubavitch as it looks toward the future. But the Rebbe's teachings "will continue to live on through his emissaries."

Other Montreal Lubavitch centres, while technically open, looked vacated. Rabbi Fine said hundreds of Lubavitch leaders and members of the Montreal community began leaving for New York early in the morning on June 12, using cars and hastily chartered buses and airplanes.

At the Lubavitch Montreal Torah Centre on Monday, usually humming with activity, only two members of Lubavitch were present, quietly sipping coffee and discussing the significance of the weekend events.

Shlomo Merling was convinced that the Lubavitcher Rebbe is in a "state of revelation that will lead us into Jerusalem now."

His friend, Shmuel Leib Bodzy, said because the Rebbe has "physically left his body, his ability to reveal himself can no longer be natural. It will come in a miraculous way."

Neither man, however, was willing to admit to a sense of personal loss, although Merling said there is a void and Bodzy acknowledged a "sense of the unknown."

Even without the Rebbe's physical presence, Merling said, "the ship is not rudderless because the Lubavitcher Rebbe is with us."

The fact that the Rebbe did not speak for over a year previous to his passing has only served to make the community and the faith stronger, Bodzy said.

Merling, however, thought a successor would eventually emerge. Bodzy disagreed, since the Rebbe represented the final "seventh generation" of Lubavitcher leaders.

A sense of what both men were certain would come, however, was on the Torah Centre's door.

On a sheet of paper taped to the front door, a message written in pen read:

"Services with the Rebbe Hamoshiach in Jerusalem!"

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, newly elected president of the Rabbinical Council of Canada (RCC), eastern region, said the RCC "joins the whole House of Israel in mourning the loss of a man who, along with Aaron Kotler and Joseph Soloveitchik, established Jewish traditional life in the spiritual wilderness of North America.

Speakers square off over sex of Moshiach

Gender-free or male?

By PHIL FINE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Both speakers were articulate. Both spoke with conviction. But the two could not have been more diametrically opposed.

Rabbi Immanuel Schochet, a prominent member of Toronto Chabad-Lubavitch and professor of philosophy at Humber College, and Prof. Rena Ziedman, chair of the Jewish Studies Department at Queen's University, spoke at a recent public forum sponsored by the Lubavitch Moshiach campaign.

The forum — at Associated Hebrew Schools' Neptune Campus — saw a three-person panel differ with Rabbi Schochet on the nature of the Messiah and the Messianic age.

But the confrontation of the evening, which lasted for close to three hours, was between Ziedman and Rabbi Schochet.

Ziedman told Rabbi Schochet the rise of Jewish feminism mandates a re-evaluation of the entire Messianic concept.

Indeed, she added, the many notable women in Judaism necessitates a redefinition of the Messiah's very identity.

"We must see the Messiah in a different light — one that is gender-free, neither female nor male, but one who brings general enlightenment and peace to the world," Ziedman argued.

But Rabbi Schochet responded that the person who will redeem the Jewish people cannot be a woman because Halachah (Jewish law) stipulates that the Messiah must be a king, not a queen.

Traditional concepts of Messianic Judaism are based on divine revelation and are, as such, unchangeable, Rabbi Schochet told Ziedman.

He added, however, that given the specific requirements the Messiah must meet, 95 per cent of Jewish men would also be excluded from the position.

Ziedman questioned Maimonides' claim that the coming of the Messiah would bring about the reintroduction of those laws which had been suspended after the fall of the Second Temple.

She said many of those laws, such as polygamy, were detrimental to the female condition.

"If these laws are meant for reinstatement, what kind of world will we be fostering?" Ziedman asked.

But Rabbi Schochet told Ziedman the Messianic age will be just as Maimonides predicts. To argue otherwise, a person would have to be able to challenge Maimonides (the Rambam) chapter and verse.

"If you cannot do that, you're stuck with Rambam — whether you like it or not," Rabbi Schochet said.

Ziedman and Rabbi Schochet did agree that the feminist movement's emphasis on universal peace was one manifestation of the Messianic age.

Rabbi Schochet also lauded the feminist movement for battling the stereotype of women as sex symbols.

The feminist movement, Rabbi Schochet continued, has "brought the world to a greater consciousness of human beings as creatures of G-d" regardless of gender and color.

Rabbi Schochet told Ziedman, Jewish women, whose merit has been a factor in every major redemption, have always played a pivotal role in Jewish history

"It's the men who gave up hope in Egypt. It's the men who were completely assimilated in Egypt," Rabbi Schochet said. "And it's the women who kept the faith."

Rabbi Schochet also noted that it was the women, not the men, who insisted upon entering the land of Israel after the Jews had wandered in the desert.

Rabbi Schochet said certain practices such as animal sacrifices, which are prophesized to resume in Messianic times may seem outlandish by 20th century standards.

But he said the coming of the Messiah would entirely change people's perspectives.

"The world will be in a completely different setup," Rabbi Schochet said. "We will see things in a completely different way."

One of the panelists, Rabbi Shmuel Spero, of Toronto's Minsker shul, asked Rabbi Schochet if it wasn't wrong to encourage all Jews to ask for the Messiah when an individual might not be worthy of redemption.

But Rabbi Schochet said a person's unworthiness should be the very reason why he should ask God to send the Messiah.

"The lower I am, the farther removed I am," Rabbi Schochet said. "I want Moshiach now, to drag me out of the gutter — and, along with me — everybody else."

Correction

The story, "Simcha Cricket Club wins championships" (CJN June 9), referred to cricket player Daniel Reynolds as a member of Canada's gold medal softball team at the last Maccabiah Games. Reynolds was in fact a member of the 1990 junior Maccabi gold medal softball team. The CJN regrets the error.

Vancouver CJA names chairpeople

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Richard Israels has been named general campaign chair of Vancouver's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA), and Ruth Ross will serve as chair of the women's division, it was announced last week.

Israels says he is "excited, optimistic and thrilled to make a positive contribution to this year's CJA campaign . . . It's the only campaign that is specifically directed towards Jewish values, Jewish beliefs and Jewish traditions — Jewish people giving time and money for Jewish people."

A former Winnipegger who moved here with his wife and family in 1976, Israels is a criminal defence lawyer. He was appointed Queen's Counsel in 1988.

Israels and his family have visited Israel on a number of occasions and last year he and his wife Bette-Jane participated in the Federation leadership mission to Russia and Israel. He has been involved with the CJA in a number of positions and was this year's winner of the Dennis Frankenburg Award.

For the Israels family, he says, living in Vancouver is a privilege — one that carries with it appreciation and responsibility. "Tzedakah is the rent we pay for our place on earth. We must never be evicted for non-payment of rent."

The women's division chair, Ruth Ross, was born in the United States and raised in Montreal. She graduated from university with a degree in speech pathology.

An active participant in the women's division for the past 10 years, she says her vision is that "we, the diverse members of the Greater Vancouver Jewish community, will pull together, recognize our common goals and choose to provide a community to which our children and grandchildren will feel tied." She hopes the CJA campaign will raise the money required to support all local needs, Israel, the needs of Jews throughout the world "and to plan for the future."

Ross says her campaign will take a person-to-person approach. Her goal is to create networks which will reach out to the diverse Jewish population of the Lower Mainland "and to make everyone feel welcome."

Ross and her husband Hy were involved in the North Shore Jewish Community from its inception and Hy, who is a doctor, served as the first cantor of the North Shore shul, Har-El. She was recognized for her CJA campaign work by receiving the Elaine Charkow Award in 1993.

HALIFAX — Dr. Ken Ozmon, chairman of the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission, was presented with the Atlantic Jewish Council's Jerusalem Plaque at a Halifax ceremony June 7.

Ozmon, also president of Saint Mary's University in Halifax, received the award from council chair Larry Freeman "as a member of a community involved in peace and world justice."

It was the second presentation of the award, which was also given this year in New Brunswick to Premier Frank McKenna and Rev. James Leland of Fredericton, a man who has spoken against anti-Semitism and Holocaust deniers such as Malcolm Ross.

Last year Halifax Mayor Moirs Ducharme received the first Jerusalem Plaque.

"I am honored," Ozmon told the audience of more than 200 at Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

"I accept on behalf of the many people who work harder and are more deserving than I in fostering human rights in Nova Scotia," he said.

In an interview, Ozmon said the Nova Scotia commission offered to assemble a panel on human rights discrimination for the New Brunswick commission to further discuss the Malcolm Ross issue, "but they didn't pick up on it. I think it is worthwhile to talk of the whole matter of free speech.

"There has to be some point where free speech has the potential to affect someone else's rights. And that's the Malcolm Ross issue, where there is an objective of fomenting hatred. There have to be mechanics to face this."

The plaque presentation was accompanied by 12 Nova Scotian teens recalling their experiences on the recent March of the Living.

The Halifax teens spoke eloquently about the emotional ups and downs they felt. "Poland was death," said Naomi Ginsberg. "But Israel was life. Flying into Israel was such a hopeful sight. It was one of the most magnificent feelings."

Lisa Mendelson said the beauty and warmth and greenery of Israel was welcoming after being in "cold, dirty, grey and disgusting Poland. You had a sense you were finally home." The small contingent of Maritime teens was also overwhelmed by the camaraderie of being among 3,000 other Jewish youngsters.

"At schools, there are only a few Jews and at Camp Kadimah there are a couple of hundred," said Shawn Keyes. "But on the March there were so many, from so many countries. It was a marvelous experience."

Carmi Rubin was touched by the courage of the Jews who perished on their march to the death camps. "We marched on a very cold day, for only a few hours, and were wearing coats and sweaters and scarves and warm shoes and gloves. When the Jews of Poland marched, they had poor clothing and they marched for days and weeks."

On the bus that transported the Maritimers and several Montreal teens, Heidi Lipkus and Morris Glazman of Halifax asked everyone on board to join them in singing We'll Rise Again, a patriotic Cape Breton song written by Sydney's Leon Dubinsky and made internationally famous by the Juno-award winning Rankin Family.

"We sang it first and taught it to the rest of the kids," said Lipkus. "It was very emotional. Then we all sang it in an old Polish synagogue near Auschwitz. There was a massive group hug and lots of tears as we felt so close."

She said the song became somewhat of a theme for the trip as they presented it at "a lot of gatherings, any opportunity we could."

The 12 teens then rose again and concluded their 45-minute presentation to the Halifax community with another rousing rendition.

LEARNING ABOUT ISRAEL

Students at North York's Pleasant Public School learned about Israel and Judaism in a recent two-day program organized jointly by Orit Praag, Habonim Dror shlicha, and the Israel Program Centre.

Praag (holding poster of Israel) posed with ESL teacher Jean McGauchie and some of the many students who saw slides of Israel, heard Israeli music and learned about Jewish holidays, Jerusalem and kibbutz life. One of the classrooms was converted into a mini State of Israel decorated with flags, maps, posters and pictures. The program was adapted to suit students of all ages.

Aish HaTorah holds world-wide hookup

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If enthusiasm could mend the ills of the world, last week's Aish HaTorah international celebration would have done it.

Tikkun Olam, Fixing the World, they called the event, held here at Beth Avraham Yosef Congregation in Thornhill. A satellite hookup linked the Toronto celebration with others in Los Angeles, Moscow, Boston, St. Louis, Cleveland, New York, Washington D.C., Miami and the Aish HaTorah headquarters in Jerusalem.

The evening honored Toronto philanthropists Leslie and Judy Dan, who have dedicated Aish HaTorah's new world centre, scheduled to open in November opposite the Kotel in Jerusalem. It will be called The Dan Family Aish HaTorah Community Centre.

They have also dedicated the proposed permanent home for the organization in Toronto, which, according to Rabbi Ephraim Shore of Aish HaTorah Toronto, is scheduled to open in September 1995.

Dan, who said he had been making contributions to Aish HaTorah over the years not for recognition but because "it was the right thing to do," noted that he and his wife are not themselves Orthodox, but Reform Jews.

He said that he supported the organization because of its goal of rekindling and spreading Judaism and Yiddishkeit among all Jews, whether or not they are Orthodox.

He reminisced about seeing his rebbe being marched away by Hitler's minions in Budapest in 1944, his black hat and coat and long beard identifying him as an Orthodox Jew.

"It suddenly dawned on me ...in the eyes of the world we are all the same — we are all Jews and we should be proud of it. The differentiation is manmade and it is among us Jews."

He urged the over 1,000 in attendance that "the Jewish people continue living by practicing the teachings and values of our Jewish religion as given to us at Mt. Sinai ... and interpreted by our early prophets and learned rabbis."

Rabbi Noah Weinberg, founder and dean of Aish HaTorah, said that Jews should be like Sarah Schneirer (the founder of the Beth Jacob school system for girls) and the great sage Eliezer Ben Hyrcanos.

"Sarah Schneirer cried for those without education, Eliezer cried for wisdom.

"If we cry, we must act, and look for solutions. If we look for solutions, we will find them."

The hook-up with a group of Aish HaTorah students in Moscow, led by Rabbi Sholom Schwartz, former director of Aish HaTorah Toronto, introduced Olga from St. Petersburg, Valarie from Minsk and Olga from Moscow. They spoke with humor and enthusiasm about rediscovering their Jewish heritage and pride.

Valarie remembered having his brit milah, as an adult, in Jerusalem. "I felt reconnected to Jewish history."

He issued an invitation to Steven Spielberg to visit the Aish HaTorah centre in Minsk.

When the hook-up brought in Spielberg in Los Angeles, the producer and director of Schindler's List said that he would indeed try to get to Minsk when he went to the former Soviet Union for the opening of the movie — the first time, he said, an American film legitimately opened in that country.

The emotional highlight was the presentation of an award to Emilie Schindler, wife of Oskar Schindler. Edna Wertheim, a Schindler Jew, described how Mrs. Schindler was "warm, kind, shy, a good woman." She gave the workers extra food, established a small hospital and "acted as a mother to those who had none."

Emelie Schindler, a tiny woman dwarfed by those around her, nevertheless dominated the stage, and the screen those around the world watched her on.

She said in German that she had acted for totally humanitarian reasons, when she saw helpless, suffering people, stripped of all their rights, not for reward or honor.

President Bill Clinton sent a taped greeting to the event, praising the contribution of the Jewish people to the world, and Aish HaTorah's educational efforts.

Musical entertainment was presented by Aish HaTorah student Brad Schachter, Alex Moses and the Zemer Orchestra.

The Toronto link of the satellite broadcast was coordinated by Ricky Magder of Motion Picture Video.

Hamilton couple honored at Negev Dinner

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — What is most disturbing about the continuing rise of anti-Semitism and racism, a Conservative member of the Ontario Legislature told close to 500 guests at the recent Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Tribute Dinner here, is the "false separation" between the Holocaust and anti-Semitism.

"While the Holocaust horrifies us, anti-Semitism, in whatever form it takes, does not receive a quick response from our society," charged Burlington South MPP Cam Jackson.

He said it took eight days before a swastika daubed on the side of the Ontario Legislature was removed, as if it "had little or nothing to do with the Holocaust."

Nowhere, remarked Jackson, "is this false separation between the Holocaust and anti-Semitism seen more clearly than in the often confused debate of racism in our society today.

"The most clear example of this is the Nation of Islam," an organization billing itself as a movement to combat racism, yet whose leaders, he said, "are noted for their violent anti-Semitic statements."

But rather than condemning these statements and trying to stop public hatred, "what we are seeing," Jackson stated, "is a prolonged debate in the media that appears all too frequently to find some sort of justification for it."

Held at the Hamilton Convention Centre, the dinner in tribute to Stan and Liz Tick was one of the most successful in the 41-year history of this event here.

Tributes to the popular and well respected couple were warm and heartfelt and, as JNF Canada national vice-president Pat Alpert observed, it was "a wonderful night" with "a very special excitement in the air."

Alpert commended the Hamilton community for their contributions to JNF.

Consul General Dror Zeigerman was there on behalf of the state of Israel. He said Israel can continue peace negotiations only with freely and democratically elected representatives of the Palestinian people.

The presentation of the Negev Dinner citation was made by 1976 Negev Dinner honoree William Morris, who said of the Ticks, "service is their hallmark."

The couple each paid eloquent tribute to their late parents for having instilled in them, as Liz's late father Harold A. Minden, put it "the importance of being involved in the community, of giving of courselves and of both our time and our means."

Stan, a prominent city lawyer, said "a strong community is a necessity if you want to teach your children values and Jewish identity, which will ensure continuity for them.

"Continued growth of the community can only be accomplished through a strong Federation, where all the institutions work together for the common good of the community," said Stan, a former Federation president and UJA campaign chair.

There were tributes from Deputy Prime Minister Sheila Copps, who five years ago accepted a Negev Dinner citation for her late father, Mayor Victor Copps; Stan Keyes, Liberal MP for Hamilton West; Hamilton Mayor Bob Morrow and Dundas Mayor John Addison; Jewish Federation of Hamilton-Wentworth president David Steinberg; and Hamilton Hadassah-WIZO president Linda Waxman.

Hamilton 1994 Negev Dinner honorees, Liz and Stan Tick, with Deputy Prime Minister Sheila Copps (right).

There was also a tribute from the Tick children, Jackie and Keith Barwin, who expect their first child this month, and Howard and Robbie.

Proceeds from the dinner, which was co-chaired by Marcia and William Halpren, will go towards the Reshafin Reservoir in the Beit She'an Valley.

Nice And Easy...The Way It Should Be

Turn down the heat this summer and lighten up at Lawrence Plaza.

This seasons trend is clear and uncomplicated with simplicity first and foremost in mind. Everything, from casual to evening wear, is elemental.

Easy does it denims continue to be an indispensable part of everyone's wardrobe – shirts, shorts, vests, overalls and jeans in a wide array of colours and textures team up comfortably with pure white shirts.

The highlight this summer is very light, natural cotton and lycra tanks with belted white cotton/linen pants. Linen or raffia weave vests, waffle tops and printed wrap skirts also combine very well for an easy, casual comfort.

This summer will introduce a splash of colour including fuchsia, crimson and lemon which blend remarkably well with your already existing naturals.

One of the most popular items of this season is the extremely versatile tank dress in back-to-basics navy, black or white. Wear them to work or accessorize with dazzling jewellery for distinctive evening wear. What could be more simple... and easy?

The same uncomplicated trend also holds true for men's wear with blues and whites high on the list. Light-weight cotton stripped rugby shirts, cable-knit V-neck sweaters or button-down denim shirts matched with cotton or denim pants will keep him feeling and looking cool all season.

And what is summer without beach wear? Dramatic colours and eye-catching cuts in one and two piece suits are here along with coordinating or mix-and-match cover-ups. You can even coordinate towels and luxurious bath robes to your beach wear.

Match this all up with slim, strappy sandals, toe-loop leather thongs and some playful sunglasses with a twist and you're all set for summer. Nice and easy – the way it should be.

Discover the difference at Lawrence Plaza...where we make shopping nice and easy with everyday savings of 25 - 65 percent. You'll find lots of bargains on designer and brand name fashions, accessories, houseware, books and much more!

Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto
ANNUAL REPORT 1993 ... A Year of Achievement

FINANCIAL RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

A special planning committee, chaired by Paul Morton, sought to bring together differing points of view on the future of fundraising for our community. Mr. Morton and fellow committee members Shoel Silver, Saul Koschitzky, Gerry Sheff, Lionel Schipper, Judy Scheininger and Elizabeth Wolfe consulted local and national experts in preparing their report. The committee was mandated to make recommendations on: ensuring the primacy of Federation fundraising; strengthening endowment and annual fundraising; and combining planning and fundraising perspectives.

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL

Lawrence Bloomberg and Lawrence Fein, Co-Chairmen
Debbie Kimel, Women's Campaign Chair

A key component of Financial Resource Development, UJA is the community's primary fundraising arm, enabling the Federation to support myriad services in Toronto, nationally, in Israel and around the world.

• The UJA Target - Despite a distressed economy causing hardship to many contributors, the campaign met its $40 million target. Approximately 30,000 contributors and 2,000 volunteers helped accomplish this difficult task. The most important factor responsible for UJA's success was the Challenge Fund, established by a group of donors to match all pledge increases. The Fund contributed nearly $5 million to the campaign.

• Golden Givers Program - The first of the combined Financial Resource Development initiatives, this program, honouring donors with at least a 25 year history of giving, has registered more than 1100 participants. Golden Givers have been awarded special certificates and receive their own newsletter. The program chair is David Green.

The Women's Campaign raised over $4 million through the efforts of more than 500 volunteers. The campaign counted on the largest number of contributors in the past five years.

• Washington Mission - Forty women flew to Washington for two days of fact finding on diplomatic developments and issues affecting North American Jewry.

• Dor L'Dor - The Generation to Generation program was undertaken by the Lion of Judah and Atarah Divisions to encourage mothers and daughters to share UJA fundraising efforts. These two divisions raised $1.9 million.

BEQUEST AND ENDOWMENT FUND

Wilfred Posluns, Chairman

The Fund, another key component of Financial Resource Development, provides permanent financial resources for new and growing needs beyond the Federation's capacity to finance through annual UJA contributions.

• More than $3.5 million in gifts were added to the Fund's base, an increase of over 10% of its total assets.

• The Fund ensured the availability of $1.8 million over 2 years for the JCC rescue operation. Approximately $400,000 has already been disbursed.

• Multi-year grants were allocated to Camp Ramah for the Tikvah Program, which integrates special-needs campers into a full camp experience; Jewish Family & Child Service and the JCC for a unique Multiple Sclerosis self-help project; and Jews for Judaism to combat missionary activities.

THE BOARD OF JEWISH EDUCATION

Sandra Brown, Chair

The BJE supplies subsidies and grants to Jewish school students, through UJA campaign funds. It also offers professional development for teachers and administrators, ongoing consultation services, a pedagogic library and an audio-visual centre.

• BJE co-sponsored a two-day Mini-CAJE conference for 1300 Jewish educators, with 97 sessions presented by some 70 lecturers from Israel and across North America.

• BJE hosted the National Bible Contest and the Creative Writing Contest. Other community events included the annual Jewish Schools' Choir Festival (Zimriyah) and dance festival (Rikudiyah).

• Through the Jewish Teachers Seminary, the BJE expanded its teacher certificate program and maintained its study program for senior teachers seeking academic and pedagogic development.

PROGRAM INITIATIVES

ONTARIO JEWISH ARCHIVES

Cyrel Troster, Chair

• Archives benefited from the acquisition of several significant collections.

• Exhibitions were mounted at Gibson House, the Betel Centre, the Baycrest Centre and the new Bathurst-Clark Library in Vaughan.

• "Sense of Spadina" tours were provided for many Jewish day schools, synagogues and organizations.

TEL-AIDE: JEWISH DISTRESS LINE

Bonnie Kates, Chair

Tel-Aide meets a critical need for people seeking comfort when faced with difficult and desperate situations. Specially-trained volunteers compassionately handle calls on wife abuse, behaviour problems, grief, loneliness, disintegrating relationships, poor health and suicide.

• Highlights •

DEPARTMENT FOR HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

Judy Gwartz, Chair

The mission of the Department for Human Resources Development is to assist in the recruitment, training, placement and development of lay and professional personnel. This past year, HRD:

• conducted workshops for decision-makers on financial and policy issues

• offered orientation sessions on the role, structure and operating procedures of the Federation Board

• provided support for the professionals of small Jewish agencies

• created ongoing connections with downtown Jewish community residents

• supplied more than 100 direct service volunteers to affiliated agencies

• welcomed over 500 Jewish newborns to the Toronto community through its Welcome to Our World program

TASK FORCE ON JEWISH CONTINUITY, ASSIMILATION AND INTERMARRIAGE

Aaron Brotman, Chairman

The task force report follows two years of intense attention to the topic, including focus groups and dozens of meetings with organizations and individuals. The task force is composed of high school and university students, and lay leadership covering the entire community spectrum.

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION

Beverley Holtzman, President

JWF, the umbrella for 50 Jewish women's volunteer organizations, unites women from diverse religious, cultural and ideological backgrounds and strengthens their role in our community.

• Shalom Toronto - More than 50 volunteers greeted 90 newcomers to Toronto from around the world, under the leadership of Yvonne Martell and Debbi Stern.

• Presidents' Council - Chair Judy Noyek gathered the presidents and vice presidents of 50 affiliate organizations for educational sessions on the dynamics of publicity and the Israel-PLO accord.

HOLOCAUST REMEMBRANCE COMMITTEE

Eleanor Getzler, Chair

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee is dedicated to preserving the memory of the Shoah through education, and to preventing racism by helping others understand and apply the lessons of the past.

• Over 20,000 people, including students from across Canada and around the world, visited the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre at the Lipa Green Building this past year.

• The 13th Annual Holocaust Education Week was an unprecedented success, with more than 50 community-sponsored programs attended by over 5,000 people.

COMMUNITY PLANNING AND ALLOCATIONS

Barry Tissenbaum, Chairman

Community Planning and Allocations (CP&A) addresses a wide array of needs: educational, social, cultural and community development. CP&A committees undertake policy setting, planning, evaluation, program development and budgeting.

• Central Campus Agency - CP&A developed a new approach to delivering services for university-aged women and men, on and off campus.

• Elder Services/Long Term Care Reform - In response to a provincial initiative, the Federation, Baycrest Centre, Senior Care and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living participated in this joint effort. A proposal to create a Jewish multi-service agency is being prepared for presentation to the government. Alan Sandler, chair of the Elder Services Committee, teamed with Baycrest's Stephen Cole, Ruth Margles and Elliott Peranson of Senior Care and David Magil of the Betel Centre to develop this proposal.

• Jewish Community Centre - Federation president Bernard Ghert, together with Marty Goldberg, Alan Sandler, Alan Winer, Michael Daren, Wilfred Posluns, George Wasserstein and Lorie Waisberg led the Federation effort. A financial restructuring was achieved with the bank's cooperation. New operating and governance procedures are being discussed with the JCC leadership. A "transition" team composed of Marty Goldberg, Tom Lobel, Sheila Engel, Geoffrey Bledin, Paul Nightingale, Phil Daniels, Barry Tissenbaum, Elizabeth Sokolsky and Jack Chisvin has been working on the concept and design of the new Bathurst JCC operation.

• Jewish Arts Directory - Under the leadership of Brooky Robins and Cyrel Troster, the Federation published this unique directory which lists 300 Jewish artists and arts-related resources.

• Jewish Hospice Program - This inter-agency project, chaired by Michael Steele, is currently handling 45 cases, 15 more than projected capacity.

• Jewish Information Service - Under the direction of chairman Victor Rosenthal, JIS has been experimenting with extended hours during the week to provide more convenient access to Jewish community information.

Award Winners to be Honoured at Annual Meeting

BEN SADOWSKI AWARD OF MERIT

This prestigious award is presented to an outstanding Jewish community leader for ongoing commitment, for interest in the welfare of others and for combining high ideals with community participation.

This year, JUDY GWARTZ is the 1994 Ben Sadowski Award of Merit recipient.

Mrs. Gwartz's long and varied volunteer career exemplifies the outstanding leadership which this award recognizes.

She has already been honoured with the Federation's Leadership Development Award. Among the many organizations with which she has been associated are United Israel Appeal, Jewish National Fund, Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Centre, Beth Tzedec Synagogue and the United Way.

Within the Federation, Mrs. Gwartz has served as chairperson of the annual UJA Women's Campaign, the Holocaust Remembrance Committee's Anne Frank Exhibit, the Women's Advisory Committee for the Bequest and Endowment Fund, and the Jewish Information Service Advisory Committee. She was also the first President of the Jewish Women's Federation, and serves as a Federation officer.

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT AWARD

This annual award was established to encourage young men and women to undertake leadership roles in the Toronto Jewish community. It is presented to young leaders who demonstrate extraordinary service and commitment.

The Federation is proud to announce two Leadership Development Award recipients: DR. JILL GOLDBERG REITMAN and LES KLEIN.

Dr. Goldberg Reitman has consistently demon-strated community leadership. She is currently vice-president of the Jewish Women's Federation Social and Political Action Committee, and a former chairperson of UJA's Business and Professional Women's Network.

In addition to her Federation role, Dr. Goldberg Reitman is or has been active with Mount Sinai Hospital, United Synagogue Day School and the Canada Israel Cultural Foundation.

Les Klein started his communal activities as a participant in the Federation's Leadership Development program. He soon became a member of its planning committee and eventually its chair.

His leadership ability is obvious to all, through his work in the UJA Construction Division and as chair of the Federation Social Planning and Allocations Committee.

Mr. Klein is a senior partner in the architectural firm Quadrangle Associates.

SHEM TOV AWARDS

These awards are presented annually to leaders who represent the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service to the Toronto Jewish community.

LEWIS J. MOSES, Board of Jewish Education

Mr. Moses's Jewish community involvement covers more than 40 years. A long time member of the Board of Jewish Education, he also serves on the board of Eitz Chaim Schools, and is an officer of the Jewish National Fund. Mr. Moses has devoted himself to raising funds for UJA, Israel Bonds and a host of other important causes.

ELLIOTT PERANSON, Senior Care/ Community Services to Jewish Elderly

Mr. Peranson has been a Senior Care volunteer for 10 years, serving as president from 1989-1993. He remains a member of the Board and Executive Committee, and was recently presented with its Marie and Jack Freedman Memorial Award in recognition of his long-time contribution on behalf of the community's Jewish elderly.

JACK SCHWARTZ, Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa

Mr. Schwartz is a founding member of the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa, and currently serves on its Board. The agency provides interest-free loans for business, personal or educational uses. In addition, Mr. Schwartz successfully raises funds for Israel Bonds, the Jewish National Fund and the Chabad Lubavitch Movement.

MICHAEL STEELE, Kehilla Residential Programme

Mr. Steele, currently president of the Kehilla Residential Programme, has been involved since it began 12 years ago. His previous positions include: director, Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto; chair of the Jewish Hospice Advisory Board and the First Conference on Palliative Care. He was also instrumental in establishing the Elm Ridge Seniors' Residence.

RABBI DR. SOL TANENZAPF, Jewish Student Federation

Rabbi Sol Tanenzapf, Ph.D., has fused a career as a York University Religious Studies Professor with an abiding concern for Jewish continuity. A board member of the Jewish Student Federation since its inception, he has also lent his expertise to the United Synagogue Youth Commission and Jewish Family & Child Service.

CYREL TROSTER, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto/Ontario Jewish Archives

Mrs. Troster has been an invaluable guardian of Jewish culture in Greater Toronto. She chairs the Ontario Jewish Archives and is actively involved with the Cultural Services Planning & Allocations Committee (CSPAC). One of her favourite pastimes is leading "Sense of Spadina" historical tours.

Weizmann Women fete group's founder

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In its five years of existence in Toronto, Weizmann Women for Science has worked to educate women about science, particularly about research at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel. Over time the group's mandate broadened to include educational programs for both men and women.

Women for Science recently made its first foray into fundraising with a tribute dinner honoring Marvelle Koffler, the group's founder. The gala celebration at the Sheraton Centre, attended by over 400 people, marked the successful inauguration of the International Weizmann Women for Science Research Fund to underwrite research into diseases affecting women, such as cancer, arthritis, heart disease, osteoporosis and reproductive disorders.

American gynecologist Florence Haseltine, Washington-based president of the Society for the Advancement of Women's Health Research, emphasized that women's health issues are not restricted to gynecology, but include gender-specific symptoms and effects of any disease.

Four years ago the women's health issue "exploded" over the fact that women had not been included in a major medical research study, Haseltine said. "That study is now cited more often for women not being included than for whatever the result was," she added.

Haseltine thanked Koffler for introducing her to Weizmann Women for Science and spoke of the "spirit of community" she has found at the Israeli university as a visiting researcher.

Robert Prichard, president of the University of Toronto (U of T), spoke of the collaboration which exists between the U of T and Weizmann on projects such as cancer research. "The Weizmann Institute is a leading example of an organization seeking the benefits of research without national boundaries," he said.

A highlight of the evening was the performance of Visions, a specially commissioned musical tribute to Koffler composed by Ben Steinberg, director of music at Temple Sinai. The piece was performed by two young musicians, Naida Cole on the flute, accompanied by pianist Xak Bjerken.

"While commissioned works are never an exact portrait, I was very conscious of certain things about Marvelle, namely her visions, because she is a visionary, her joyfulness, her determination, and at times a certain expression which can best be described as reflective, and I wanted to include those in the work," Steinberg told The CJN.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld of Temple Emanuel, who recited Hamotzi, spoke of Koffler's "boundless enthusiasm, inexhaustible sense of humor and love of all G-d's children."

"Marvelle had a clear vision and was able to transform it [into reality]," said Carol Gordon, co-chair, Weizmann Women for Science. "She is a source of inspiration." Gordon co-chaired the dinner with Raylene Godel and Jill Kaplan.

Koffler, whose husband Murray founded the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science in 1965, chaired the first meeting of Weizmann Women for Science in Israel in 1988. Women from around the world took the idea back to their respective countries to form local groups. Buenos Aires, London, Los Angeles, Mexico City, Miami, Milan, Motevideo, Montreal, New York and Paris are among the cities which have Weizmann Women for Science groups.

"I felt the need for women to take a more active role in the activities of the Institute and to have women more identified with science," said Koffler, who received two standing ovations. "Weizmann Women for Science has in a very short time not only fulfilled its mandate to educate woman and man about science, but has evolved to the point where it is now building bridges between the broad community and science.

"The Weizmann Institute is a symbol of humanity at its best. It is a place of hope, of light, of responsibility and the search for truth," said Koffler.

Lt.-Gov. Henry Jackman spoke briefly, as did Rose Wolfe, chancellor of the University of Toronto and honorary dinner chair, who introduced Prichard. Guests of honor included former lieutenant-governor Lincoln Alexander; Geraldine Kenney-Wallace, president of MacMaster University; former federal cabinet minister John Roberts; and Haim Waxman, Israeli vice-consul. Zubin Mehta, conductor of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, paid tribute to Koffler in a video clip.

Shofar Award presented

TORONTO — Phil Lev, a board member of Toronto's Beth Sholom Synagogue and leader of Beth Tzedec Synagogue's 166th Cub Scout pack, has been named the second Canadian recipient of the much-coveted Shofar Award, presented by the National Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting and Guiding.

Lev recently received the award at Beth Tzedec Synagogue in a sanctuary filled with hundreds of Cub Scouts and their parents, and family, friends and associates from chartered accountants Deloitte & Touche, where he is a partner.

The award was presented by Jewish Advisory Committee executive member Robbie Engel to recognize Lev's promotion of scouting among Jewish youth.

Lev has been part of the Cub leadership team since 1986. Beth Tzedec Cubs raise money for the Baycrest Centre, Jewish Family & Child Services, United Jewish Appeal, MAZON Canada and contribute to the Passover Food Drive of the National Council of Jewish Women.

NEW LASER TREATMENT LETS SNORERS- AND THEIR MATES - GET SOME SLEEP

Silence is golden - particularly at 3 a.m. For many people however silence is a longed-for luxury in the wee hours due to the log-sawing, window rattling sounds of a snorer. It's no laughing matter when your spouse has to routinely sleep in another room; or when you have to give up going on trips with friends because it involves an over night stay and the embarrassment of keeping everybody awake. According to recent studies 40% of the population snore to some degree and 25% have a problem which is so significant that others around them cannot tolerate it. Now, this may be a thing of the past.

Dr. Steven Cohen is an Ear, Nose and Throat surgeon and Chief of the Department of Otolaryngology (ear, nose an throat surgery) at Centenary Health Centre in Scarborough. After 12 years of experience with the classic method of surgery to eliminate snoring, Dr. Cohen this year became the first doctor in Scarborough to offer Laser Assisted Uvula-Palatoplasty as a solution for heavy snorers. The new procedure, commonly referred to as LAUP was developed by a French surgeon. It is performed under local anaesthetic (similar to the freezing in a dentist's office) and, says Dr. Cohen, initial reports show elimination of snoring or reduction to tolerable levels in 85 - 90% of cases.

To understand how the laser procedure works, we must first explain how snoring occurs. During sleep, the muscles in the side walls of the throat relax allowing the walls to collapse. The tongue falls backwards. The back end of the palate and the uvula (the small piece of flesh hanging down in the middle at the back of the palate) get caught and starts to vibrate like a nose maker.

The laser is used to reconstruct the back of the palate to change its firmness and trim off a portion of the uvula. The result - snoring disappears or reduces to levels which are no longer a problem in the vast majority of patients. The actual time to do the procedure is about 10 - 15 minutes. Between 2 - 4 treatment sessions are usually required, spaced 1 month apart. After each treatment there is some discomfort in the throat but regular activities and work can be resumed with minimal, or no time off.

Another condition, related to snoring is called sleep apnea. This occurs when the throat muscles relax even further and the collapse of the tongue and the throat cause the patient to actually choke himself while sleeping - and even stop breathing for short periods of time. This condition can be medically dangerous - involving abnormal blood pressure and reduced blood supply to the brain. The LAUP procedure, while 90% effective for people with snoring alone; has about a 50% success rate when the person has sleep apnea as well. The alternative to the surgery is a mask device called CPAP (Continuous Positive Airway Pressure).

The LAUP procedure is not covered by OHIP. However, more and more people are discovering that this is an invaluable new innovation which now allows them - and others close to them - to get a good night's sleep.

Steven R. Cohen, M.D., B.Sc., F.R.C.S.(C) is certified by the Royal College of Surgeons of Canada and has been practicing Otolaryngology and Head and Neck Surgery, for the past twelve years.

Further information about this effective treatment for snoring can be obtained by calling (416) 281-0300.

Diplomacy called key to 'grown-up' marriage

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A "grown-up" marriage involves not just compromise but gracious compromise, according to the author of the New York Times best-seller Necessary Losses.

"In other words, when we give him his way we must do it without reminding him, how fine, how good, how sensitive and how unbelievably magnanimous we are being," said Judith Viorst.

Viorst recently spoke about marriage, children, being a grown-up, turning 50, and caring for elderly parents, at a Toronto Hadassah-WIZO Youth Aliyah luncheon held at the Four Seasons Inn On The Park.

The prolific author of several collections of poetry, children's books and non-fiction, she has received a special commendation from the American Psychiatric Association "for contributions to the mental health of the nation."

A grown-up marriage, she said, involves the recognition that we are not each other's teacher, parent, editor or home improvement project. "In a grown-up marriage we know that we do not always have to be in love with each other. The advantage of a grown-up marriage is that during those times when you fall out of love [and] he falls out of love with you, you stay together until you [both] fall back in again."

We got carried away with the message we received around us and in magazines, urging us to express ourselves without holding back, she told the all-female audience. "We were frank, we were honest and we bruised and battered each others feelings a lot, all in the holy name of communication."

In a grown-up marriage, she stressed, there are times when the most absolutely perfect thing you can do is just shut up.

Viorst acknowledged that no marriage is totally grown-up, adding that there may be certain irritating qualities in a husband that we can never accept, such as a man's tendency to refuse to ask for directions if he gets lost while he is driving.

As our children grow more independent, she said, we have to stop telling them how to live their lives. "We have to make the switch, and it is a tricky switch from being parental protector to parental presence. We have to be grown-up enough to let them grow up."

As young adults, one of our important grown-up discoveries is learning that we do not have to follow our parents' agenda — share their moral precepts or their tastes, or join their synagogue or political party. A few years later we may discover that it is not necessary to reject everything our parents value entirely, Viorst pointed out. "We learn that separation doesn't have to involve repudiation . . . I'm very much like my mother and father and I know that is just fine."

As we grow older and our mothers and fathers grow older, she said, we may find ourselves becoming our parents' parents. We may drive them to the doctor, write cheques for them, take time off work when they fall ill, all the while trying to figure out how we will ever meet our obligations to them, our families, our jobs, and if we can fit it in, to ourselves. "Faced with their need for our help, we feel compassion, concern and very responsible."

Becoming a grown-up means coming to terms with our parents' aging and with our own, Viorst noted, "with the fact that our body is not what it used to be, with the fact that our options aren't what they used to be."

Although she believes to be grown-up is to understand your limitations, she said we still need to leave room in our hearts for a few crazy dreams.

World ORT leader meets local group

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On a recent trip to Toronto and Montreal, Ellen Isler, World ORT Union director general, gave ORT board members an update on ORT activities around the world.

At a Toronto luncheon held at the home of Moshe and Anat Wertheim, Isler told the group that the Israeli Council for Higher Education Authority has given "the penultimate stage of approval to Braude College, Karmiel, one of ORT's 120 schools in Israel, to grant bachelor degrees.

Braude's equipment must be upgraded to meet final approval. When that happens, Braude will get international recognition and transfer credits will be available. "Many more students will come from western and eastern Europe. The school will grow exponentially," Isler said.

She said ORT prides itself on maintaining a margin of excellence in all of its schools but in order to maintain this margin, extra money is needed.

"ORT Israel is responsible for one-third of the total secondary education in the country and there is an evergrowing need in order to keep up. The total number of Russians in Israel is about 900,000 and these people had to be integrated educationally. Many came with skills not applicable in Israel and one of ORT's jobs is to redirect people's talents and energies into earning skills."

Isler stressed that ORT is a healthy organization but it is in crisis. "The number of people are extraordinary. Either we have to find the means to follow through on our promises or we will have to cut back."

She said ORT will continue working with the two million Jews she estimates are still in Russia. "We have to do what we can to help them maintain the edge of excellence."

ORT is opening a high school in Moscow in September. The building and teacher salaries are paid for by the Russian government, while the Israeli government is supplying Jewish studies teachers of Russian backgrounds. ORT is responsible for a high-tech computer laboratory and the school principal. Isler said the Russians are involved "because they are desperate for models of educational reform and they figure if ORT hires the principals, its philosophy will purvail."

ORT also works with third world communities to establish mother-and-child care programs, like a community centre in Peru that included a kitchen and running water.

"We teach others to teach and then we withdraw. We make an incredible difference in people's lives," Isler said.

Mark Pearlman, president of Canadian ORT, Ontario region, introduced Isler. Present at the meeting were Dr. Mel Schwartz, national president of Canadian ORT, and Edie Glazer, national president Women's Canadian ORT. Longtime donors including Michael Landauaer, Max Guttmann, Percy Rosen, Mike Rogow and Ken Bodenstein were honored.

Goodman Judaica on display

TORONTO — The late Max and Evelyn Goodman were married 51 years and spent a considerable part of that time acquiring one of the most interesting collections of Judaica in Toronto.

Rarely seen before now, the collection will be on display at the Kanner Heritage Museum of Baycrest Centre starting June 20.

The exhibit, titled A Passion for Collecting: an Exhibit of the Judaica from the Estate of Max and Evelyn Goodman, is being presented with the support of the Goodman family: daughter and son-in-law Sheila and Robert Rothman and granddaughters Lorne and Mimi Anisman, Shawna Rothman and Richard Cornblum.

Evelyn Goodman, in particular, was passionate about collecting any work which reflected a Jewish theme or craftsmanship. She set up a worldwide network of contacts, although she herself rarely travelled outside of Toronto or Florida.

The Goodman collection includes colorful kippot from many countries, Middle Eastern amulets and jewellery, religious and decorative objects, textiles and tzedakah boxes.

Because they were also interested in local history, the Goodmans acquired posters advertising political meetings in Toronto; badges and pins from Jewish charitable organizations; calendars published by Jewish businesses; and watercolor paintings of Toronto synagogues, some of which no longer exist.

They collected plates depicting Jewish scenes or history from Royal Doulton and Wedgewood. They also gathered a considerable number of works on paper: stamps, magazine covers, newspaper articles, and rare haggadot produced for donors to the Jewish Orphanage for Girls in Israel.

Particularly notable are several large, three-dimensional New Year's cards; fine art by well known Jewish artists Arthur Szyk, Saul Field and Rappaport; and samples from Evelyn Goodman's vast collection of Jewish postcards, which number in the thousands.

The Kanner Heritage Museum is located in the Silverman Garden Court of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care at 3560 Bathurst St. The hours are Sunday to Friday, 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. Admission is free. For more information, please call 789-5131, ext. 2802.

Ottawa lawyer honored for service to community

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Is winning awards becoming a habit for Stephen Victor? Two years ago, he received the Gilbert Greenberg Award, the highest honor given by the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa.

Last week, Victor was jointly honored in Ottawa by State of Israel Bonds and the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, at a dinner for 400, for his years of professional and community service. Thomas Keneally, author of Booker Prize winner Schindler's List was the guest speaker.

Victor, an Ottawa lawyer who was appointed Queen's Counsel in 1981, is the only person in the city's history to have chaired all of Ottawa's major Jewish organizations: the Jewish Community Centre, the United Jewish Appeal and the Jewish Community Council. He is on the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress, a board member of the United Israel Appeal and an executive member of the Council of Jewish Federations. Last year he chaired the Canada-Israel Committee Parliamentary dinner and conference, a biennial event for the Jewish community and Members of Parliament.

Victor has also worked as a volunteer campaigner for the Ottawa Civic Hospital Heart Institute, Crohn's and Colitis Canada, Jewish Family Services and Hillel Lodge, Ottawa's Jewish home for the aged.

"I don't see life as a short dash over low hurdles...," said Victor. "Instead, I see life as a perpetual high jump or pole vault, where they keep raising the bar, and my job is to get over it."

Lest anyone mistake Victor for a saint, he took a bit of good-natured ribbing at the dinner.

About his successful law career: "He remembers the name of my clients who lost, of course, when I can't remember their name," said friend and colleague David Scott. "He quotes from judgments in excruciating detail, always judgments in his favor, always a complimentary aside from the presiding judge."

About his ambitions: "From our first meeting he showed me his dream," joked Israeli Ambassador Itzhak Shelef," and his dream was to become minister of defence of the State of Israel."

At Victor's request, friends wishing to make donations in his honor were asked to purchase Israel Bonds. About $600,000 in bonds was raised. Most will go to Hebrew University in Jerusalem to establish the Stephen and Gail Victor Centre for Trial Advocacy, where students will develop practical skills in trial law. But $100,000 of the money is earmarked for the University of Ottawa, Victor's alma mater, where it will support a graduate student exchange program between the University of Ottawa and Hebrew University.

Stephen Victor

"Hebrew University represents the quest of the individual for the growth of knowledge, to arm oneself with arguments, not armaments, the best defence for Israel in the years to come," Victor said.

As he did in Toronto some weeks ago, Keneally spoke about Oskar Schindler's extraordinary effort to save Jews from the gas chambers by employing them in his factory. Keneally said Schindler was the only manufacturer of those who used Jews — and there were others — who kept his workers alive and saved them from summary executions on the factory floor.

"The only dissenter from the general severity was this flawed, black-marketeer, " said Keneally.

He also spoke about the tenacity of Leopold Page, the luggage-store owner and Schindler Jew who pressed Keneally, as he had been pressing others, to write the book.

"Europe gave the Jews the emphatic message that their presence would not be tolerated. I don't know, if I had had that message, whether I would have spent 35 years telling the story about the Nazi who saved me," Keneally said.

Students' poem about peace gets first reading in Ottawa

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A poem about peace written by four Beth Jacob School students so impressed Hamilton-Wentworth Liberal MP John Bryden that he promised to read it to Prime Minister Jean Chretien in the House of Commons. He kept his promise.

The poem, written by Lewis Greenspon of Grade 5, Grade 6 students Elana Zur of Kitchener and Michael Levy of Dundas, and Grade 7 student Elaine Cooper of Cambridge, was recited by Beth Jacob students as part of Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations at the Jewish Community Centre.

Among the local dignitaries and politicians assembled in the front row was Bryden. During intermission he approached teacher Sheila Freedman and asked her to send him a copy of the poem. The children had recited it from memory, but Freedman had luckily brought copies "just in case."

Freedman said Wendy Schneider, co-editor of the Hamilton Jewish News and also a Beth Jacob teacher, received a fax from Ottawa on the morning of May 6, informing her that Bryden was going to read the poem in the House that afternoon and that it would be televised on the Commons channel.

The children were unable to watch it that afternoon, but "Ottawa didn't waste any time and sent us a couple of videos," said Freedman. "The kids were really excited; we never expected this."

Bryden read the poem on the occasion of the signing of the Israel-PLO autonomy accord.

"A few weeks ago," he told the House, "the children of Beth Jacob Hebrew School in my riding gave me a poem they had written. I would like to share their words with you:

'Peace is special, it means love
The symbol of peace is a dove
Peace means to hope and to care
And make new friends everywhere.

There have been a lot of wars
We don't need this anymore

Enough of all the fighting, killing
Too much blood is all we're spilling.'

"Mr. Speaker," concluded Bryden, "the prayer of these children, all between 10 and 11 years old, has been answered. The dove of peace flies over Jerusalem."

TEEN FASHION NOTES

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

CHAT students Maureen Leshem, Mark Fischer, Melissa Behar and Daniella Siguy model teen fashion do's.

Daniella Siguy would never be caught dead wearing used jeans, but the weathered denims are Maureen Leshem's fashion trademark. Add to this the fact that Melissa Behar wears her jeans only in colors and it quickly becomes apparent that in teen fashion today, anything goes.

Siguy, Leshem and Behar are Grade 11 classmates at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). Their different approaches to fashion reflect their individual tastes and budgets; Siguy, 17, is a self-confessed clothes junkie who works part time in a fashion store to support her habit, while Leshem, 16, stretches her wardrobe by sharing with her two sisters.

But the three, along with 10 other CHAT students polled, say there are some fashions no one should wear. They include belts, Playboy pendants, platform running shoes, pigtails, sandals worn with socks, striped ties, jeans worn so low on the hips they defy gravity and going braless. CHAT's dress code is less demanding — "no shorts, no holes, no tanks," according to Leshem.

Some male students have their own set of fashion don'ts. "I like women without make up and with long hair — the natural look," says Mark Fischer, 16. Fischer himself wears low-key clothing — denim Gap shirt, jeans, white T-shirt and scuffed boat shoes — and is turned off by too much flash.

On this his female classmates agree. Most wear little make up and their jewelry is understated. "I haven't changed my earrings in three years," says Ilana Jackson, 17, fingering her small gold hoops. Siguy and Behar traded in the designer watches they got as bat mitzvah presents in favor of the glow-in-the-dark digital Timex Ironman. Rugged boots in leather (from Roots) and in canvas-rubber (by Palladium) complete the down-to-earth look.

Self-described individualist

Other looks include long flowing skirts, Blue System jeans, another shirt tied around the waist ("I'm self-conscious about my body," Behar says about the extra coverage), sports team paraphernalia, fishing vests, slim leather chokers and hair scrunchies. Birkenstock sandals are big too, but some CHAT students prefer Naot, the Israeli look-alike. "Buy Jewish," says Fischer.

Also popular is the hippie look, popular amongst fans of the counterculture band, the Grateful Dead. Josh Wolfe, 17, is one such "dead head," and points with pride to the beaded necklace he bought for $5 in San Francisco.

"It's my treasure," he says. "I got it in Haight-Ashbury [epicentre of the 1967 Summer of Love], right around the corner from the Grateful Dead's house. I've had it for three years and it hasn't left my neck."

Wolfe, who wears his hair long and his shirts tie-dyed, isn't above going clothes shopping with his mother. Actually, most of the CHAT teens I spoke to solicited their mothers' opinions. Wolfe went with his recently to a camp store to buy $10 cotton long-sleeved t-shirts in black and navy. "She lets me wear whatever I want to wear, as long as I don't go to shul in jeans or dress inappropriately for the occasion," he says.

But sometimes even moms get it wrong. Leshem was with her mother when she bought seven plaid shirts this January; she now finds them ugly and regrets the purchase. The self-described individualist also regrets buying clothes from Roots, Gap or Club Monaco stores "because everyone else has them."

Alleviate children's boredom with family-oriented events

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

When school ends and kids' boredom cries begin, its time to check out some of the myriad events taking place in and around Toronto.

Black Creek Pioneer Village, 1000 Murray Ross Pwy, near Jane and Steeles, is featuring A Soldier's Life For Me on June 18 and 19. The village, always full of activities displaying 19th century life, will be invaded by hundreds of soldiers in full color uniform who will stage mock battles and skirmishes. As well, a skilled hatter will display the rare craft of felt hat making. Fathers free on Fathers Day.

The Kortright Centre, on Pine Valley Drive in the city of Vaughan, is an environmental centre with about 180 acres of forest. On June 18 and 19 the kids will love Little Fish Stories, an interactive story hour featuring a walk around the pond and river. Beginning July 1 and continuing every weekend in July, Kortright Kids Stuff teaches kids to make environmental crafts such as birdfeeders. Honey bee trails, nature walks and hands-on activities are featured every day.

Riverdale Farm, 201 Winchester Ave. near Parliament and Wellesley is a city farm featuring such animals as cows, horses, bunnies and chickens. A variety of activities are offered, weather permitting.

The Town of Richmond Hill, Ward 3 Ethnic Relations Committee is running a Sell and Shoot Garage Sale with over 85 vendors and a basketball free-throw contest for the kids, June 26, 1-4 p.m., Bayview Community Centre, 114 Spadina Rd., Richmond Hill. Every Thursday at 7 p.m. in July and August, a variety of musical acts perform at Mill Pond Park on Mill Street

Ontario Place is awash with activities for kids big and small. Some of the new attractions include Laser Fantasy 3-D, a rock 'n roll laser show featuring a display of lasers and lights synchronized to a score of tunes by rock artists such as The Who and Peter Gabriel.

SeaTrek is a futuristic deep sea submarine simulator adventure combining special effects technology, large format film, a simulator theatre and animatronics. Set in the year 2055, SeaTrek invites visitors to participate in the story of the heroic Ocean Rangers who are engaged in a battle to defend a deep sea research station from an environmental pirate.

Other Ontario Place activities include the HMCS Haida Navel Museum, Lego Creative Play Centre, Nintendo Power Pod, Children's Village, Hydrofuge, MegaMaze, Mini Greens, Wilderness Adventure Ride, waterplay, pedal and bumper boats. Children's Festival performances, hosted by Babar the elephant, run four times daily.

Canada Day Celebrations abound in the Toronto area. . .

The City of North York's Mel Lastman Square is offering an evening of family entertainment featuring folk singer Valdy, the country tunes of Prescott Brown and comedians from Yuk Yuks. Fireworks begin at 10 p.m. Call the Hotline at 395-7350.

Day-long performances featuring such artists as children's performer Rosalie, the Royal Regiment of Canada and Bada Brava will be held at Skylight Theatre in Earl Bales Park. For information, call 392-3846.

At Plunkett Park Community Centre, Steeles and Islington Avenue, a three-day festival is planned including a bocce tournament, entertainment, live music and games. Fountainhead Park, Keele and Finch at Sentinel Road, is having a community festival including pony rides, a parade and fireworks in the evening.

In the Town of Richmond Hill, there will be a lot of goings on at Richmond Green. Activities include children's village games, petting zoo, clowns, mini cars and pony rides. Opening ceremonies are at noon and fireworks begin at dusk. Call 905-771-8870 for information.

The City of Vaughan is featuring events from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., at the Maple Community Centre, 10190 Keele St. including children's entertainer Lenny Graf, carnival games, pony rides, dog show, children's crafts, free swimming, face painting and children's sports and relay games. For information, call 905-832-2377.

Skating to economic success

 FACT: The unemployment rate for youth 15 to 24 years of age as of January 1994 is 19.2 per cent compared with 11.4 per cent for the general population.

TORONTO — Although the figures are daunting, many people, parents and children alike, are calling upon their skills, their sense of independence and their confidence to start their own businesses.

Brothers Brett and Devon Cranson, aged 16 and 14 respectively, are a perfect example. They illustrate the kind of ingenuity and dedication it takes to turn a negative situation into a positive, money-making venture.

April was the beginning of the second year of their seasonal business — Spring In-Line Skate Hockey League.

As Devon explains, their business idea was initially formed to provide a convenient, environmentally-friendly solution to their rollar blading street woes. He says that most evenings the weather and the sinking sun posed problems for them and for their friends just when the game was getting good.

These budding entrepreneurs put together a survey and headed to the nearby mall and the corner convenience store to determine who would be included in their target market. Application forms were made up to include a paragraph concerning injury liability for insurance purposes and parental permission.

The boys decided to run their league from April to the end of June, as this is the dry time before the beginning of summer camps and the traditional summer sports. Considering the competition they would have after June, their decision was well thought out. Brett is a camp counsellor and Devon attends camp; so after the three months of running the league, they can take the rest of the summer off.

Brett says the next step was the scheduling and since the local arena management was extremely helpful, this step was surprisingly easy. Last year, when the Cranson brothers held their first registration day, they ended up with 160 people who wanted to participate in the league. This year, that number rose by 30 per cent and instead of managing three divisions of 12 teams, they now have four divisions and 16 teams.

The cost of the three-month program was set at $100, which included the price of the arena, team jerseys that carry the company logo, and of course, payment for the league managers. Brett and Devon make about $1,000 for three months of work.

The old adage about all work and no play is something the Cranson brothers take to heart. As well as managing the league, they both coach and participate on teams. Their father is also a coach.

For Brett, who plans to go to university to study sports administration and eventually have his own arena, says this experience has been valuable. Devon, who plans to study to become a doctor, and perhaps a coaching professional, says that the fact that he ran his own business will look great on a resume.

Any pitfalls?

Devon says their ages were a problem in two cases — finding sponsors and getting other parents to accept them as responsible owners of the league.

"It takes a lot of dedication, a lot of hard work and you have to be willing to put a lot of effort into it [your own business]," Devon says, adding that expansion plans are underway for next year's league.

What do their friends think of the fact that the brothers are running their own business?

"Most of them are team participants so they love it," Devon says.

Programs established to increase small business

TORONTO — Transferable skills, career planning and career infusion in the classroom — these are some of the 90s buzzwords of the jobless economy people age 15 to 24 are hearing from educators.

What these words mean is that the older generation is getting worried.

Gone are the secure positions that would see a worker from graduation to retirement. New technology means that keeping abreast of innovation is crucial. The shift to a global economy means that competition for positions will be fierce.

The current generation of educators, such as Susan Muskat, coordinator of guidance services at the Board of Education for the City of York, realize that the situation for new graduates is discouraging and intimidating, and they are determined not to lose a generation of young minds.

Therefore, by utilizing such methods as making students see their transferable skills (skills that may be transfered from the academic environment to a work setting — such as punctuality), career infusion in the classroom at a younger age (through cooperative and apprenticeship programs), and career planning, educators are instilling confidence and self-esteem into the next generation of workers.

Muskat notes that there is much work still to be done in educating parents and convincing teachers to implement this new approach to career planning.

In conjunction with the work that is being done in the classroom, unique programs have been developed that will offer other options to those facing unemployment.

One such organization, The Learning Partnership, is a not-for-profit organization founded in May 1993 by a group of Metropolitan educators and business leaders who share a common interest in public education. All private and separate school boards are members.

"We can no longer afford to operate in isolation. We each must take time to see what's happening in our communities beyond the walls of the boardroom and the classroom," says Charles Pielsticker, the founding chairman of The Learning Partnership.

Stumbling block

The literature sets out the group's goals. First is to bring together key leaders in education, business and the community so that educational resources and opportunities are maximized. Second is to encourage youth to develop skills that will make them better problem solvers as well as caring and responsible citizens for the future.

Other goals include: increasing literacy; improving student retention; promoting careers in science and technology; and motivating young people and enhance their readiness for school.

To that end, The Learning Partnership has set out a list of activities. They will be involved in the Entrepreneurial Immersion Project for elementary schools; they will implement the Inventor Mentor Project that will match students with mentors to come up with an invention; they will have a Take A Youth To Work day which will place a grade 9 student in the workplace; and they will help pilot The Reading Game to encourage elementary-aged children to read.

Many of these programs will kick-start the motivation of young people. For those who progress to the point where they want to establish their own business and create their own job, funding may be a stumbling block.

In addition to the work done by The Learning Partnership, the provincial government has several programs that will financially encourage young people to develop their own businesses.

For example, the Student Venture Program offers qualifying participants a loan of up to $3,000, available to students who wish to own and operate their own business. Over 10,500 firms have been started with program funds over the past 20 years. The loan is guaranteed by the Province of Ontario and is interest-free for the period between April 1 and Sept. 30.

Last year, the Ministry approved 655 applications and the principal advanced was $1,855,000. Based on 30 per cent final reports returned to the Ministry, total revenues generated to date is $1,941,632. Also 217 jobs were created, not including the owners. As reports come in, those reports will be considerably higher.

Those interested in obtaining more information on Student Ventures and other programs, contact the Ministry of Economic Development and Trade.

TORONTO — "When family members begin to think about sending their loved one to a retirement home, 95 per cent of the time they can rest assured that they are making the right decision," says Harvey Hofbauer, administrator for Terrace Gardens Retirement Residence, at Bathurst and the 401.

"It's my experience that families suffer a tremendous amount of guilt and trepidation when thinking about such a change for their loved one. My advice is not to allow feelings of guilt to make you second guess your first instincts."

Children may have made promises to their loved ones that they are unable to keep. They may have assured them that they will always care for them in the comfort of their own home. But sometimes such promises are impossible to keep because the family needs to attend to their own obligations such as a career or caring for their young children. Or it may be that the family member simply requires more care than they can possibly provide at home.

"In recent years, we have seen residents enter our home at an increasingly older age and in much frailer condition. The average age of our residents is now about 85. This says to us that families [could be] struggling to keep their loved ones at home longer than ever before. But there comes a time when seniors need more than families can give," Hofbauer explains.

How do you know when your loved one is ready for a retirement home? Hofbauer suggests three factors to consider when deciding on the next step to take for your older parent, aunt, uncle or friend.

1. Early Signs of Dementia — A recognition that their mental condition has deteriorated. This may manifest itself in all kinds of ways such as forgetfulness on a continual, sporadic basis.
2. Specialized Care is Required — When their needs go beyond meals on wheels; they may be reaching the point where an individual home care worker cannot meet their needs and more care is required for a number of problems.
3. A Need for Companionship — Not everyone has a wide supportive network of family and friends. Your loved one may be lonely and need companions of a similar age and lifestyle.

When making your decision, Hofbauer suggests that you involve the potential residents in the decision-making process and allow their rights and needs to be expressed. And most importantly you must realize that you are not sending them to the "hole of Calcutta." In most cases, the residence that they're entering is designed to offer a better way of life.

"At Terrace Gardens, for example — one of the retirement residences owned by Community LifeCare Inc. — we generally see an upward curve in the resident's mental, emotional and physical health within four to six weeks. We've never lost a resident that has come to our home. In fact some of them have been here since 1985," says Hofbauer.

"We offer a home environment that carries a spirit of dignity and quality of life. All levels of care are provided as well as services such as a beauty salon, and activities such as theatre, swimming, bingo and other outings. Our challenge is to help our residents maintain their mental, emotional and physical health," he says.

". . . Forty hours of service in five consecutive eight-hour clips, stretching out like a seemingly endless train, terminating abruptly at age 65 . . . where a gold watch is presented and the boss picks up the tab for drinks." (The Future of Work by Paul Dixon)

TORONTO — A great motivator.

Perhaps this is what Neil Zworth was thinking when he quit his corporate life in multi-national marketing to start his own business.

Two years later, with sales tracking at $250,000 and a new son named Max, Zworkin says, "I did it with a lot of heart, not a lot of money."

In August 1991, Zworkin founded Neil's Soup Kettle. Although he had several business ideas, he went with the soup company because "there was nothing like it in Toronto at the time." That is, no one was offering a line of vegetarian soups with exotic flavors such as Szechuan Sweet and Sour, Kashmiri Carrot, Brazilian Black Bean or Panhandle Corn Chowder, to name a few. (The soups are not under supervision of the Kashruth Council.)

"My immediate family and my in-laws have a great appreciation of food and they were a great focus group for me," Zworth says, adding that he uses his mother's potato leek recipe and his mother-in-law's gazpacho recipe.

It wasn't always easy. Beginning a business in the heart of the recession meant Zworth's company had to grow slowly if he wanted to avoid spending too much money. Initially, the 34-year-old approached commercial kitchens to see if he could utilize their facilities during their off-hours. Many turned him down. Finally, arrangements were made with a caterer, and later with a pasta manufacturer. For several months, Zworth used these facilities until logistical problems forced him to secure a place of his own.

Today he owns a 1,600 square foot facility that gives him the space he needs for production and product development. He says that any money he made along the way was reinvested in the company.

Knowing he had the space to make and deliver larger orders, Zworth set out to market his soups. In February 1992 he established a small cart at the St. Lawrence market on the corner of Jarvis and Front Street.

He purchased a large soup pot and on market day he filled it with one type of soup and offered free samples to customers. It was only weeks later that the management at the market approached Zworth asking him to set up a permanent kiosk once their planned expansion work was complete. Zworth says he liked the fact that the market exposed him to a large cross section of people and agreed.

Today, he operates a 110-square-foot kiosk that is aptly decorated to illustrate the home-cooked goodness of his soups. He notes that bottling his soups in mason jars evokes a feeling of quality and traditional home cooking in many of his clients.

Zworth talks about some of the hardships he had to face. He says that the loss of a resource pool is a problem. Taking it to its simplest level, "You can't simply go to the supply cupboard when you run out of office supplies."

He points out that as owner he had to assume every role. "You have to realize that you are chief cook and bottle washer," he says, citing his "carrot chopping days."

"At the same time," he continues, "you have to then be able to change, put on presentable clothes and go out and sell your product."

Zworth says that having gone through the experience of wearing all the hats, he can now empathize with the person who has taken his place as the carrot chopper. "I will have an appreciation of jobs that other people are doing because I have done them myself."

Having turned a one-man operation into one that has a staff pool of five, where does Zworth see himself in the future?

"You look at the success stories like Ms. Vickies and hope that you can emulate that," he says, adding that the line will be expanded to include soup-related products.

Zworth says he has had "considerable interest expressed by a large, upscale company in Western New York."

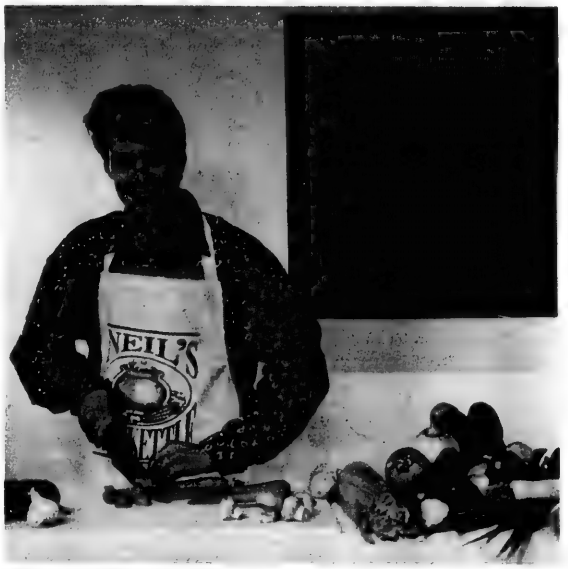
He cautions people against jumping in with both feet when they are trying to secure orders because if you can't deliver what you promised, your reputation will suffer.

Does Zworth have a golden rule?

"If you have something you believe in, stick to it and see it through."

Above all, Zworth stresses that support mechanisms are essential. He says beginning a business can be lonely and it is crucial to have family support as well as peer discussions and feedback. Later, as the company begins to succeed, the benefits are many. Zworth cites his quality of life and time flexibility as some of the benefits he is now realizing.

"I'm very happy and thankful for the support I get from my wife," he says, adding that if he wasn't his own boss, getting time off for his son's birth and his first few weeks of life wouldn't have been easy.



Neil Zworth has worn all the hats (and the apron) while getting his business, Neil's Soup Kettle up and running.

Business Briefs

51 Per Cent of El Al Is Sold

TEL AVIV — The government's privatization committee has approved the sale of 51 per cent of El Al Airlines to the general public, paving the way for privatizing the national carrier.

The announcement followed a meeting of the Ministerial Committee for Privatization which accepted the recommendations of Transportation Minister Yisrael Kessar and Finance Minister Avraham Shohat to privatize El Al.

The actual sale of shares is expected to take place in October when the once-ailing airline is to be taken out of the 13-year-long receivership under which it has been operating.

A board of directors for El Al will be named once the company is out of receivership.

Kessar opposed the sale of a controlling interest to a private investor in order to protect the airline's workers who have already expressed fears about their salaries and working conditions under the new owners.

El Al was put into receivership by the government 13 years ago when it suffered heavy losses in the wake of numerous strikes by one or more of the 12 local unions representing El Al workers.

Discussions were also held to study airline security. Security costs total about $55 million a year; 80 per cent of that is covered by the government.

Kessar and Shohat will decide during the privatization process how the security costs will be shared by the government and El Al shareholders.

An Updated Economic Agreement

BRUSSELS — An updated trade and economic agreement between Israel and the European Union (EU) is expected to be completed by the end of the year, according to Michael Harish, Israel's minister of commerce and industry.

Speaking at the end of a two-day visit to Brussels recently, Harish said that since January, representatives of Israel and the European Executive Commission have been discussing the new agreement which will update Israel's 1975 free trade accord with the EU.

Europe is Israel's largest trading partner. Last year, more than 60 per cent of Israeli imports were from European countries and more than 38 per cent of Israel's exports were to the 12 EU member states.

In recent years, Israel has tried to elevate its trading status with the EU to gain better access to the European market.

Israel wants to include the telecommunications and services sectors and is eager to participate in European research and development programs.

Israel Signs $2 Billion Deal

JERUSALEM — The United States and Israel recently signed the authorization for the St. Louis, Missouri-based McDonnell Douglas to produce 21 F-15I Eagle fighter jets for the IAF.

The decision to purchase the F-15I, a version of the U.S. air force's F-15E, was made last January, following a year-long evaluation process that included consideration of the Lockheed F-16ES, a jet tailor-designed for Israel.

The IAF finally decided to purchase the all-weather, day/night, long-range F-15I.

The deal, worth about $2 billion, is expected to extend the life of the F-15 production program through 1999. McDonnell Douglas officials said 93 F-15s are on order until the end of the century.

According to the deal, Israel will have the option of buying up to four more jets. Additionally, McDonnell Douglas and Israel will design an offset deal that will move the manufacturing of some of the plane's components to Israel.

The first planes will be delivered by 1997.

TORONTO — "I have never been so happy making so little money," says Elliott Snitman, owner of Verigold Jewellers.

"I've also never had more stress, more grey hair or more satisfaction," says the 30-year-old who has always wanted to own his own business.

Snitman entered the jewelry business at the age of 15 when he and a high school friend formed the first Verigold Jewellers, selling their wares at flea markets and during holidays.

Up until two years ago, Snitman had been working for other jewelers, designing and selling merchandise. Then he decided he knew enough about the industry and business in general to establish his own firm.

Since that time, Snitman says, "Every dollar has been accounted for." He compares his venture to a baby: you have to feed it for many years and even then, it's never fully fed.

Like most entrepreneurs, Snitman does everything himself and this gives him the power to treat customers as he sees fit. For example, he tells of a woman who brought him a piece that needed repairs. Snitman told her he would have it ready for her on a certain day, but the day arrived and the job wasn't completed. When the customer did pick up the piece, Snitman didn't charge her.

Another example is the customer who brought him a 117-year-old porcelain family plate. The piece had been broken and she gave it to Snitman to see if he could repair it. He refused to charge her for his work.

Getting to know and care about his customers made Snitman decide to buy a store at Highway 7 and Markham Road in Markham. When he went to look at the property, the people in the area were very friendly and reminded him of the "open-door policy" with which he was raised. To this day, Snitman says, "My customers have not let me down."

Although he was reluctant to reveal any sales figures, Snitman did say that he is "anticipating completing this year with a 30 per cent increase at a time when the industry is suffering." Snitman added that he is covering his expenses and growing slowly.

One of the reasons for his continuing growth is direct contact with his clients. "I always considered myself a liaison between the boss and the customers when I was working for others. I had to satisfy the customer and create a profit for the company. Even if I got slapped on the wrist for it, I always stood up for the customer."

One of the pitfalls business owners face is a sense of frustration. Snitman says there are some days when you feel you're not accomplishing anything. You remember the paycheques you used to get and, at the same time, you see the bills stacking up. However, Snitman says, giving into that frustration hinders production. You have to be motivated.

Asked why he didn't tap into any government programs for help, Snitman replies that he wanted to set himself up on his own and says that "the government is totally unsupportive of small business." He says he would like to see taxes waived and access to government programs made easier. Those lucky enough to be accepted into a program drown in the paperwork they have to keep because of the government's strictness.

For himself, over the next five years Snitman anticipates growth and perhaps a second store if he can entice his brother into the business.

As well, being one who always gives back to the community, Snitman says he hopes to participate in the local high school cooperative education program so students can benefit from the hands-on learning experience.

Any words of wisdom for potential entrepreneurs?

"No. 1: do research; and No.2: when financing make sure you have lots of operating capital," he says, adding that once you think you have enough to survive one year, double it.

"No. 3: take it slow. Its the old story of the tortoise and the hare. Take it slow."

TIPS FROM PROS

By YARON HAIK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With the hustle and bustle of daily life most of us have little time to consider long term goals, such as how we can save the money for the down payment on a house or whether there will be enough left over for our children's education.

That's why it's important to take the time to think about your future, to think about your long-term goals and what you'll have to do to achieve them.

To set financial goals your first step is to establish your net worth, the difference between your assets and your liabilities. Your assets should include cash savings, Canada Savings Bonds, the cashable portions of life-insurance policies, jewelry, cars boats, RRSPs and, if applicable, the equity in any property or business.

Once you have determined your assets add up your short-term liabilities, such as charge accounts, credit card balances, loans and taxes due this year. Then, calculate your long-term liabilities, such as mortgages and business loans.

Always remember to factor in cash reserves — equal to about four months' worth of your salary — to cover emergencies, including loss of employment. Also, do you have enough to pay for short-term necessities, like vacations or appliances?

When you have calculated all of your expenses, how much cash is left to invest?

If there isn't very much, then you should seek a way to make both your fixed and liquid assets more productive. This is when you should examine your long-term goals, such as buying a home, a cottage or taking an exotic holiday.

Financial goals

Other things you will want to consider are whether you will want to buy a larger home in the future, or perhaps move to a different neighborhood. And do you want your children to attend a community college or university, or send them to an out-of-town institution?

Possibly the most important question you will want to ask yourself is: What kind of lifestyle do you expect to lead when you retire and will you have the means to support it?

It's very difficult to pin a precise dollar value to these questions, which is why you may need to consult a financial planner or investment advisor. A professional investment expert can advise you as to how much you'll need to earn to support your long-term goals and will be able to suggest ways in which you might better realize them.

These experts will likely suggest such investments as mutual funds, real estate or a carefully selected common stock portfolio. Mutual funds, in fact, might be the most attractive option because they are liquid, diversified and managed professionally.

Consider all investment options carefully with the help of a professional financial planner or investment advisor.

Examining these options is an important first step in meeting your long-term goals. However, once you have established a plan, have the patience to make it work. You won't become a millionaire overnight, but by reducing your expenses and debts, planning your taxes carefully, and saving and investing, you can make a great deal of headway in realizing your personal financial goals.

Improved relations may lead to tours of Israel, Jordan

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

AMMAN — To Israelis, the gleaming white capital of Jordan seems as far away and inaccessible as Timbuktu.

But in reality, Amman is a one-hour drive from Jerusalem — for those who are able to get there.

Since 1948, Jordan has denied entry to all Israelis and all but a handful of Diaspora Jews wishing to visit the country. For decades, those few Jews who were able to sneak in with "clean" passports (those without Israeli stamps) risked imprisonment.

Now, thanks to warming relations between Israel and Jordan, visits by Diaspora Jews could be just weeks away.

And, according to a close adviser to King Hussein, Israelis will be welcome as soon as the two countries sign a peace treaty, possibly within two years.

Last week, David Clayman, Israel director of the American Jewish Congress (AJC), traveled here to explore the possibility of bringing Diaspora Jewish tourists to the country as an add-on to AJC tours of Israel.

Some 300,000 Jews have visited Israel on AJC tours over the past 30 years.

Throughout Clayman's three-day visit, key government officials and travel professionals expressed keen interest in opening their country to Jewish tourists, Israeli stamps and all, he said.

One official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, assured Clayman that the "clean" passport rule "is not an explicit policy," and noted that Jordan began to permit tourists with Israeli stamps to enter, albeit unofficially, several months ago.

Clayman, who had first visited Jordan in 1986 as a member of an AJC delegation invited by King Hussein, called this month's visit "very important."

"Everyone in Jordan, bar none, was interested in having us bring tour groups from Israel," he said.

The visit was the culmination of months of quiet negotiations between the AJC and Khalil Adwan, a Jordanian travel agent and unofficial emissary of the Hashemite government.

Since there are no communication links between Israel and Jordan, the American embassy in Amman served as intermediary, facilitating a meeting between Clayman and Adwan in Jerusalem in late March to discuss the feasibility of Jewish tourism to Jordan.

Sitting in the lobby of the Intercontinental Hotel in Amman, whose clientele includes Western businessmen and Arab sheiks, Clayman said, "I made it very clear from the start that AJC would not even consider adding Jordan to its itinerary unless the Jordanians allowed tourists with Israeli stamps to cross into Jordan and permitted 'double crossings,' " meaning that tourists can leave and return to Israel over the Allenby Bridge.

Behind closed doors, officials assured Clayman that the king will agree to these demands, perhaps as soon as this week.

"It is in the interest of the Jordanian government to enable Jews to visit," Clayman said. "The tourist industry is important to the Jordanians, yet it is minimal at best. They realize that Jordan is not on the American tourist map at all, and they want to tap into that market.

"Another motivation — and this is only conjecture — is that the Jordanians see American Jews as an important channel for influencing U.S. policy and public opinion," he said.

"They may want us to present their case to the American administration. They may be thinking that if we come and see their problems firsthand, we could be helpful in presenting their case both to the administration in Washington and the government in Jerusalem."

Nonetheless, Clayman added, "there is a real measure of sincerity in the Jordanians.' desire to see this terrible conflict end, to open the doors with Israel."

Adwan, the Jordanian emissary, couldn't agree more. Born in the Old City of Jerusalem, where he lived until the age of 16, he is eager to promote tourism on both sides of the border.

"I've always thought about tourism and open borders, but it wasn't until the signing of the peace agreement in September that I began to take the idea seriously," Adwan said.

A frequent visitor to Israel, Adwan readily admitted that "Israel has more to offer tourists than Jordan does.

"But I see Israel and Jordan as a package, combining the beauty of, say, Jerusalem's Old City with the wonders of Petra," he said referring to the ancient Nabatean city.

"That means that Jewish tourists will want to come to Jordan, and that Christian and Muslim Arabs will want to visit Israel. This will happen when there is a genuine peace."

Already, Adwan said, "things are improving. Crossing the Allenby Bridge used to be a humiliating experience. The Israelis would do a strip search and open up every single piece of luggage. Recently, they've introduced an X-ray machine and simply send the luggage through that."

Clayman, who said he encountered surly Israeli border police during his own trek across the Allenby Bridge, near Jericho, agreed that Israeli border guards "must learn to treat people with more respect, period."

For tourism to succeed, Clayman said, both sides must put aside their prejudices. "This is an Arab country with no history or experience with Jews. Even with all the rancor between Jews and Palestinians in the territories, there is as much binding us as separating us."

As a beginning, "the Jordanian press should stop publishing anti-Semitic articles and cartoons that depict Jews with long noses."

Jews, too, must change their perceptions for this project to work, Clayman said.

Though the AJC expects to be the first Jewish tour group to receive an official welcome from Jordan, it does not want to be the last.

"The AJC has worked out this arrangement, and the Jordanians are still careful and wary. They don't want to go too fast or too loud," Clayman said, adding that both sides will benefit if this experiment goes well.

"Within the near future, many American Jewish tour groups will be visiting Jordan."

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

It's no secret that Israel's 270 kibbutzim, which have about 170,000 residents in total, are at a major crossroads. Many were established early in this century by groups of heroic settlers motivated by an ideological mix of communism, Zionism and the need for collective living. Encouraged by David Ben Gurion to spread far and wide and to establish settlements where others would follow, the kibbutzniks were often Israel's gatekeepers. No new kibbutzim have been established in the last decade, and it is widely conceded that the average kibbutz community can no longer make a respectable living from agriculture alone.

David Duvdevani readily concedes that the kibbutz movement, financially troubled and ideologically outmoded, must redefine itself to ensure its long-term survival. Duvdevani, representing the Kfar Giladi kibbutz in the Galilee, is one of a new breed of kibbutzniks who are trying to bring the uniquely Israeli institution into the 21st century.

"No one really knows what the future of the kibbutz will be," he says. "You can ask 1,000 different kibbutz members that question, and you'll get 1,000 different answers. All we know for sure is that the kibbutz is going through some sort of change. Eventually, it won't be anything like the first kibbutz, which was established in 1906."

Opened factories

Attempting to diversify, many kibbutzim have opened factories, thereby upsetting the socialist apple cart. Factories, kibbutz members discovered to their chagrin, impose their own class system, requiring specialized technicians, managers, shift supervisors and salesmen who wear suits, take clients for lunch, and go on business trips. Industrialization has altered the old order in which members shared all property, contributed equally and received rewards in equal portion.

In recent times, social problems from outside, like drug abuse and domestic violence, have crept into the kibbutz's relatively sheltered world. The first murder officially recorded on a kibbutz occurred several years ago. Unfortunately and inevitably, the idealism of the elders has trickled down as disillusionment to many of the younger generation. According to Duvdevani, only 3.8 per cent of the Israeli population live on kibbutzim, and as many as half the young people who grow up on kibbutzim leave as adults. The reason the first figure isn't higher, and the second isn't lower, is simple, he says: "People don't want to give up the material things."

In recent years, many kibbutzim have started to explore and profit from various high-tech ventures. Some manufacture superior farm machinery for export, some dabble in pure agricultural wizardry — for example, attempting to breed fish that are as meaty and tasty as chickens. Today's kibbutzim operate about 360 industrial enterprises that represent about $1 billion worth of investment and earn about seven per cent of the country's gross national product.

Duvdevani's own job title, as printed on his business card, underscores the new savvy capitalism of the kibbutz movement. He is the marketing and sales manager of the Kibbutz Hotel Kfar Giladi, whose slogan is, "You've got a friend forever in the Galilee." Founded by Hashomer Hatzair in 1916, Kfar Giladi's 740 residents are involved in the production of cement, eyeglass frames, turkeys, avocados and other produce; they also run a fishpond and the hotel, turning over about $55 million yearly from all sources.

Many kibbutzim like Kfar Giladi have expanded into the tourism industry. Some have built dedicated guesthouses, while others offer functional bed and breakfast rooms at reasonable rates, as well as restaurants, gift shops and daily activities that include swimming, tennis, horseback riding and mudbathing. Today the largest hotel chain in Israel is not Dan, Sheraton, Hilton or Moriah. It is the Kibbutz Hotels chain, which features 30 establishments with 2,400 rooms across Israel, from the Red Sea to the Hermon, the Mediterranean to the Galilee.

A few hotels in the chain are four-star but most are three-star, says Duvdevani, the chain's sales and marketing manager. "We try to be different. Most Kibbutz Hotels are not built as a single building. You'll see more gardens, more open spaces. There's a friendlier atmosphere and people dress casually." Rates, too, are friendlier. Roughly one-third of all occupied rooms in the chain are taken by Israelis touring their own country.

Heritage tour set for France

From Paris to Provence: Jewish groups planning trips to France can take in the sights and enjoy a voyage into history with a special Jewish heritage tour offered by Provence Voyages.

Based in the south of France, the travel agency is offering a six-day tour that kicks off in Paris and ends in Marseilles. In between, participants will visit the cramped "carrieres" (Jewish quarters) in a variety of cities and tour museums dedicated to Jewish art and history. Also on the itinerary are visits to the oldest synagogue in France, located in the southern city of Carpentras, and to one of France's oldest medical schools, founded by Jews and Arabs from Spain in the picturesque city of Montpellier.

The tour includes a view of Les Baux de Provence, a medieval village situated on a rocky plateau, as well as a tour of the papal palace in Avignon and the famed "pont" (bridge) nearby. The tour ends in the old city of Marseilles, with a walk through the port area and a visit to the city's main synagogue.

Jewish history in southern France dates back to Roman times when refugees from Judea, fleeing the destruction of the Temple, settled in what are today Arles, Vienne and Narbonne.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

The God I Believe In by Joshua O. Haberman, Maxwell Macmillan Canada $32.50

Do you believe in a personal God? Have you ever had a profound religious experience? Does God intervene in history? Are the Jews a chosen people? How do you understand the idea of "brit" or covenant? How do you explain the Holocaust and the nature of evil? Do you have faith in the coming of a Messiah or a messianic age? Is there an afterlife?

These are the basic questions that Joshua O. Haberman, retired senior rabbi of the Washington Hebrew Congregation, asked 14 prominent Jews. Those interviewed included rabbis Rachel Cowan and Louis Jacobs; theologians Emil Fackenheim, Steven Katz and Yeshayahu Leibowitz; novelists Cynthia Ozick and Chaim Potok; scientists Philip Leder and Arno Penzias; Talmudist Adin Steinsaltz; chassidic leader Levi Isaac Horowitz, known as the Bostoner Rebbe; Yeshiva University president Norman Lamm; writer and editor Norman Podhoretz; and former Soviet refusenik Natan Sharansky.

As might be expected the answers from this diverse group — although frank, thoughtful and often surprising — cover a wide range of positions and beliefs, from Orthodoxy to near agnosticism.

Despite the chilling inhumanity of our century (what the author refers to as 'the chamber of horrors we call history"), most of those interviewed still maintain some faith in a monotheistic God and intelligent purpose in the Universe.

For Katz the conception of God is a reflection of our desire for a sense of security and meaning. He insists that "meaninglessness is the ultimate enemy of Judaism," that our actions do matter and that there is some kind of ultimate universal design into which we fit.

When Rabbi Lamm is reminded that the human being in cosmic terms is merely a speck of dust, hardly to be measured against astronomical time and that God cannot be concerned about us individually, he responds, "It all depends on how big a God you believe in. Somehow a small computer has only a certain number of bytes but a very big computer can process a great deal more information.

"I believe in a very big God who can be concerned with everything, even a speck as apparently insignificant as my own life in this vast universe."

The belief in and nature of the Messiah is a source of both mystery and anticipation. For Steinsaltz the Messiah is the answer to the world's unsolved and unsolvable questions. To believe in such a personality is not to go about in a purposeless, useless way. Ozick warns that "whenever we have held such a belief, it has engendered devastation afterwards: Bar Kochba, and Shabbatai Zvi whose movement degenerated in the Frankist sect, even as much earlier a Messiah cult led to Christianity.

This book, a refresher course in Jewish theology, resolves none of the tough, complex issues that it raises. But from the adroit and knowledgeably conducted interviews there emerges for the thoughtful reader new avenues of awareness and the opportunity to re-examine and re-evaluate long held beliefs and opinions. In this sense the book is an overarching success.

Secular, shul choirs present vibrant profile of Jewish music

By ROSE TOGMAN HEILBRONN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — From the Holy Ark in Beth Tzedec Synagogue's main sanctuary, your eyes sweep up 40 feet of solid brocade drapes then veer right to focus on bold Hebrew letters standing out from the wall. The letters form the first words of the High Holiday prayer "Shemah Kolaynu" ("Lord, our God, hear our voice").

On May 31st, those voices belonged to 12 secular and synagogue choirs participating here in the Toronto Festival of Jewish Choral Music.

With selections from liturgical, traditional and folk songs, 285 performers gave a vibrant profile of Jewish music in Toronto.

"Toronto, unusual in the number and range of its choirs, is one of only a few North American cities with a choral festival," said festival organizer and composer Ben Steinberg.

The evening was sponsored by the Toronto Jewish Music Committee of the Jewish Community Centre of Toronto.

Opening the program with a vivacious Uri Tzion, the Holy Blossom Singers set the trend of combining modern and traditional elements. Their two other selections were an amalgam of traditional text with contemporary music.

Many of the more than 700 audience members hummed or sang along with Kol Shira's tender rendering of Oseh Shalom. More than a prayer, it evoked the Jew's aching for peace.

Two new compositions were presented by Temple Sinai's Choir: Shehecheyanu, by musical director Steinberg, and Hashir Shel Moshe, by Marlene Kezwer, a Temple Sinai member who two years ago won an Honorable Mention in the International Guild of Temple Musicians Young Composers Competition.

Journey through history

In a recent interview, Steinberg explained this celebration of Jewish choral music was originated almost 40 years ago as an attempt to bring together all the Jewish choirs in Toronto. In previous years, choirs also travelled from Oakville and Windsor to participate in the popular community event.

The average size of each choir was 30 members. The smallest choir, the Heritage Singers, consisted of seven women.

Excited murmurs of "young blood" greeted the Ne'Imot Singers, whose uplifting Israeli selections brought whoops and rousing applause.

Conductor Anne Berlin's choir from Temple Kol Ami led the audience on "a journey through the history of our Jewish musical heritage." Its Ma Toyu, with traditional text set to contemporary music, represented the beginning of Reform music.

Beth David's a cappella tour de force, featuring cantorial soloist Yehuda Rottner, was an audience favorite.

A special feature of the festival was the finale. The combined choirs were led this year by Brahm Goldhammer, conductor at Beth David Synagogue, who focused on the Golden Age of Eastern European cantors and composers.

Goldhammer, whose own congregation loves traditional liturgical arrangements, drew out the choir's orotund rendition of the evening prayer Hashkivenu — "Let me lie down in peace and rise to life" — set to music by 19th-century Jewish composer Nisse Spivak.

For Steinberg, the evening represents pride in our community and in our city.

"Community pride is often best expressed through music, our common language.

"When choir members stand shoulder to shoulder raising their voices in a common expression of love for our people's music, it is an expression of harmony of klal Israel," he said.

Friendship Stories: With support from the National Film Board and TVOntario, award-winning filmmaker Deborah Magidson intends to make a "personal and eclectic" documentary film on friendship. She's seeking personal friendship stories "that will make us laugh or cry, stories we can't forget." Stories may be about lost friends, old friends, betrayals and other friendship themes. To share your story, phone 416-360-0081 or write: Filmmaker, 10 Bay St., Suite 1500, Toronto ON M5J 2R8.

Media Watch: There are two items of special interest in this month's Saturday Night magazine — one positive, one negative. First the good news. Congratulations go to Norman Doidge, a staff psychiatrist at institutions in both New York and Toronto, for writing The Suit, one of three winners of the CBC Radio/Saturday Night literary contest. It's a deeply moving personal essay by a man whose father, a Holocaust survivor, died when his son was seventeen months old. Awards of $10,000 were given in each of three categories: personal essay, short story, and poetry.

Why I Hate Schindler's List, by Mordecai Richler, is a scathing critique of Steven Spielberg's critically acclaimed film, his most mature and serious to date. Richler, the enfant terrible of Canadian letters, offers a seemingly endless litany of complaints. Spielberg, he says, trivializes the subject, presents predictable scenes, has a "tin ear" for dialogue, omits essential historical information, dolls up women prisoners at Auschwitz with facial make-up, and takes untenable dramatic liberties by showing, for example, an Auschwitz shower-room that uses water instead of poison gas.

Overall, he calls the film "a badly flawed but useful primer for a younger generation only dimly aware of the Holocaust," and implies that its director — "a precocious boy" — should stick to comic-book adventure stories.

Richler's pugilistic stance is a familiar one. The Montreal author enjoys being provocative and iconoclastic, as evidenced by his various novels that satirize Jews and their society, and by his news-making exposes of Quebec separatism in the New Yorker magazine. In the Saturday Night piece, his sarcasm relating to Jews has almost a knife edge to it, and some readers may be offended. The part of the article that I liked best is the photograph that accompanied it, showing Spielberg on the set with his three principle actors.

Women's Book of Grieving: Linocuts by Toronto artist Rochelle Rubinstein Kaplan are used to illustrate A Women's Book of Grieving, a new book by New York writer Nessa Rapoport, formerly of Toronto. Rapoport and Rubinstein-Kaplan have been friends since childhood and, as Rapoport recently told Toronto Star books columnist Beverley Slopen: "I could tell from the third grade that she (Rochelle) was an artist. She was interesting even then and had a lot of flair." The artist's mother, Judith Rubinstein, has been both the subject of and the writer of highly interesting articles in The CJN in recent months.

* * *

Children's Concert: A polished children's entertainer, Rosalie (Moscoe) enchants young audiences with her upbeat singing, dancing, and dramatic presentations. Let Rosalie, Woogie the dancing bear (Ron Harrison), and Herman the frog puppet delight your youngsters at the Barry Zuckerman Amphitheatre, Skylight Theatre, at Earl Bales Park, Canada Day, July 1. Two shows, 11 a.m. and 1 p.m.

* * *

Guitarists Release CD: Brian Katz and William Beauvais, two of Canada's leading guitarists, have released a CD reflecting years of collaborative musical experimentation. Combining and contrasting various musical genres — Latin, baroque, folk, jazz improvs — Katz and Beauvais define the sounds they produce as "chamber music that reflects a jazz esthetic." To celebrate the CD's release, Katz and Beauvais are playing at various venues around Toronto in June, including The Music Gallery, 179 Richmond St. W., June 17. Bridges — as the CD is called — is available at stores across Canada.

* * *

U of T Writers' Workshop: Running July 17 to 23, this year's Writers' Workshop at the University of Toronto is open to wordsmiths eager to work intensively on their writing with the guidance of a professional writer. Instructors include Susan Musgrave, Katherine Govier and Susan Swan. Charles Israel, former director of the Banff screenwriting program, is set to launch a new screenwriting workshop; he has more than 500 radio, TV and film credits. Tuition for the week is $475. For a brochure, phone the U of T School of Continuing Studies, 416-978-6714.

Fireworks Extravaganza: The largest musical fireworks competition in the world gets under way in Toronto June 18 at 10 p.m., when fireworks are lit on a massive barge just off Ontario Place. More fuses in the Benson & Hedges Symphony of Fire are due to be lit June 25 and 29, and July 2, 6 and 9 (the Grand Finale). Information Line: 416-314-9900 or -9811.

Portraits from London: Laura Marks, a Toronto artist who went to Forest Hill Collegiate and later moved to London, England, has been showing some of her work at Nancy Poole's Studio, 16 Hazelton Ave., Toronto. The exhibition continues through June 16, with the artist in attendance 2 to 4 p.m.

Sephardi concert delight to senses

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sephardi culture is alive and well, and making wonderfully glorious music at Toronto's York University.

That institution recently hosted a special musical afternoon featuring performances by top singers and musicians in the Sephardi community.

Over 300 people packed York's Burton Auditorium for the musical first, featuring artists from Yemen, Morocco, Spain and India. There are approximately 30,000 Sephardim living in Toronto.

The concert was a delight for the senses. Listening to the chatter among the spectators, one could hear French, Spanish, Arabic and a smattering of vernacular from the Far East. Brightly colored caftans and saris added to the international flavor.

On stage, we were treated to medleys of lively songs and pulsating rhythms that have distinguished Sephardi music for centuries.

First up was acclaimed Yemen-born Israeli songstress Ahuva (beloved in Hebrew), who set the concert's pace with a rapid-fire series of Jewish and Yemenite numbers, including celebratory Sabbath songs Dour Yikra and Lecha Dodi. Clad in a beautiful black silk and gold brocaded Yemeni dress, Ahuva left the audience breathless with her renditions of Yim Ninalou, a song in praise of God, and a haunting love poem set to music which, roughly translated, is called I'm Dark, I'm Beautiful, I'm Yemenite.

The voices of the Neimot Singers, a 16-person Israeli choral ensemble conducted by Doron Ophir, resounded throughout the auditorium with a selection of Ladino and Hebrew melodies based on Biblical passages, Songs of Songs, Komi Zei and Erez Shivat Hamin. Accompanying the choir was Michael Rumack, who pounded out the tempo on the tambour, a drum of ancient origin.

Of particular interest was the a cappella recital by the Bnei Israel Quartet, representing Indian Sephardim. Never numbering more than 27,000 people, Jews of the Asian subcontinent have a long and illustrious past. Singing in a perceptible but pleasingly harmonic Indian dialect, Bnei Israel performed prayer-songs Eliyahou Hanavi and Zor Mishelou Achalnou.

Master acoustic guitarist Aaron Skitri displayed his craft with sensuous Spanish flamenco pieces and their heart-pounding rhythms.

The Sephardi concert was part of an array of fundraising events spearheaded by Sarah Taieb-Carlen, committee chair of the Department of Jewish Students at York University. She sees a vital need to raise awareness of Sephardi culture and traditions, both inside the Jewish community and amongst the general public.

According to Taieb-Carlen, York University has seeded some money for the expansion of Jewish studies to include wider research into Sephardi history, possibly to include the establishment of a permanent chair of Sephardi studies. "This would be the first of its kind in Canada," she said. "Funding such a new and innovative program is our major challenge now."

Prof. Sidney Eisen, director of York's Jewish Studies Program, emphasized the need to expand the university's Jewish curriculum.

"By developing a department dedicated to the examination of the totality of Jewish experience, we not only promote a heightened understanding of our roots among academics, but these same students will then take this knowledge out into society when they graduate. The benefits are evident."

Karp's New York exhibition goes on display in Toronto

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Live from New York, It's the O. K. Harris Gallery is a show of selected works now on exhibit at Marcia Rafelman Fine Arts.

Ivan Karp, the founder and director of So-Ho's O. K. Harris Gallery, is known for his discovery of Andy Warhol and for his pivotal role in the development of pop and modern art. He was in Toronto recently for the opening of the exhibit.

Karp, known as "The Pope of Pop," is a walking encyclopedia of New York art. He started his art career as a resident critic for the new-born Village Voice in 1955. His love of fine food led him to accept an invitation by Leo Castelli which culminated in his joining the gallery, where his sense of adventure and his loose, personal style of art dealing created an environment in which Pop Art would flourish.

His willingness to be open to new possibilities and his lack of a strict art philosophy account for his now famous open door policy, which enabled him to be the first to see the work of promising young artists.

Through this open door came Warhol, Roy Lichtenstein and many others who started out as shy, young artists nervously showing their works to Karp. Many went on to become titans of the art world.

In 1969, he founded the O. K. Harris Gallery in lower Manhattan. Karp named the gallery after a fictional character who could be blamed for everything that went wrong. "I'm only the director, but basically the final decisions are made by Mr. Harris," he would explain.

Karp says his ambition is to exhibit mature, adventurous and imaginative work of great craftsmanship by painters, sculptors and photographers, and on occasion artifacts and collectibles worthy of esteem.

Karp chose Marcia Rafelman Fine Arts for a Toronto show of selections from his gallery because of his preference for innovative spaces and ways to show art. Rafelman's new home gallery, designed by John Shnier, a well known architect, is an original setting for art shows.

Rafelman, a private art dealer, transformed a quaint Victorian house into a combined private dwelling and contemporary art gallery. She is known for her wide-ranging selection of vintage photography and international works of art. Rafelman is one of only two Canadian members of the American Association of Private Art Dealers.

Marcia Rafelman Fine Arts is located at 10 Clarendon Ave. in Toronto. The O. K. Harris Gallery exhibit continues to June 25. For viewing, by appointment, call (416) 920-4468.

Tougher hate crimes law part of federal package

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hate as a motivating or aggravating factor in the commission of a crime will soon have to be taken into consideration if amendments to the sentencing rules are passed by Parliament.

Allan Rock, minister of justice and attorney general of Canada, introduced a sentencing reform bill to the House of Commons on June 13.

It is unlikely that the bill will be dealt with before the summer break, according to Gordon Parry, coordinator of the team which prepared the bill. He feels it is more likely that it will go to second reading when the House reconvenes in mid-September.

Hate crimes would refer to those motivated by bias, prejudice or hate, based on the victim's religion, color, sexual orientation, gender, age, mental or physical disability or nationality.

Judges may — and many do — now take hate into account when considering a sentence for a convicted criminal. If the bill is passed, however, they will be compelled to do so and will likely impose stiffer sentences.

Alan Rock

Reaction to the proposed bill has been generally positive.

Parry noted that "the justice ministry is gratified by the reception to date."

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) commended Rock "for following through on a pledge he made at the organization's recent conference on human rights."

CJC president Irving Abella said the provision will send "a powerful message to all those who would perpetrate hate crimes in this country."

Hal Joffe, national chair of the community relations committee of CJC said that the organization has been discussing such a proposal with government officials for some time.

While he said that only time will tell how effective the new legislation will be in deterring hate crimes, he added, "If it deters one person, it will be a successful enactment. At least a racially motivated criminal will be out of circulation for that much longer."

Jonathan Shekter now enjoys a wide range of activities including roller blading. [Graphic Artists photo]

Heart transplant recipient gets top U of T scholarship

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Born 17 years ago with a single-ventricle heart, Jonathan Shekter managed to attain good grades at school despite a deteriorating medical condition that ultimately left him severely exhausted and unable to walk.

"Instead of two pumping chambers, my heart had only one," he explained recently. "My blood wasn't getting enough oxygen, so I was tired all the time."

Last fall, after applying for a national scholarship award from the University of Toronto, the health of the Danforth Collegiate OAC student went downhill rapidly. "At its worst it was just horrible," he recalled. "The last couple of weeks I was having trouble breathing. I was basically going into congestive heart failure."

He arrived at the Hospital for Sick Children late in December and was put on the waiting list for a heart transplant.

Although a typical wait for a donor heart is usually weeks or even months, Shekter had to wait only one day. The surgery went smoothly, and two weeks later he was sent home to recuperate.

Since the operation, Shekter's strength has increased dramatically. He swims regularly, walks several miles each day, and performs a rigorous daily exercise routine. Rollerboarding, he says, is his favorite activity. In retrospect, he says, "I had no idea how limited in energy I was, never having had a normal heart. I find it absolutely astonishing."

Heart transplants have become almost a routine procedure in the past five years, and have reasonably good survival rates, according to Shekter. Drugs are used to decrease the chance that the body may reject the new heart as a foreign object.

Israel, PLO resume discussions

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Senior PLO negotiator Nabil Shaath resumed discussions on Sunday with his Israeli counterpart, Maj.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, on the next stage of negotiations — early empowerment in five areas of civil administration for the remainder of the territories.

At a meeting in the former Gaza civil administration building, the two men discussed an agenda and location for talks which may begin next week.

Speaking to reporters, Shaath said other matters discussed included tidying up loose ends in the Gaza/Jericho Accord, such as the release of remaining Palestinian prisoners and access for Palestinians to Israel.

Shahak also mentioned the fate of Palestinians considered collaborators with Israel.

During Sunday's cabinet meeting, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said the early empowerment talks with Palestinians could only get underway in earnest after the Palestinian Authority (PA) is functioning in Gaza and Jericho.

The talks are to include two main issues: First, early empowerment will give Palestinians jurisdictional control over at least five areas of social welfare throughout the territories.

Second, according to the Israel-PLO accord signed last September, the Israel Defence Force is to redeploy outside Palestinian population centres throughout the territories.

According to the accord, the two sides are also to discuss Palestinian elections, yet it remains unclear if Israel will insist on this.

Shaath told reporters he expects PLO leader Yasser Arafat to arrive in Jericho by the end of this month.

Finishing touches

In Jericho on Sunday, workmen were putting finishing touches to street lights opposite the municipal balcony from where Arafat is expected to address thousands.

As The CJN went to press Monday morning, police in Israel were bracing for widespread demonstrations aimed at torpedoing Shaath's scheduled visit to Jerusalem.

Police brass met Sunday night in Jerusalem to prepare for the expected visit.

Shaath hinted on Sunday that he may cancel the visit, saying there could be "changes in my plans required by my work in Gaza."

Also Sunday, about 50 Jewish settlers marched down Salah A-Din Street to the PLO's Jerusalem headquarters, Orient House.

Protesters carried posters reading: "Rabin: Shaath spits in your face," and "PLO out of Jerusalem."

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert called on Rabin to "act immediately to prevent Mr. Shaath from entering Jerusalem."

"There is great fear that the stability, order and security in the city will be disturbed if you allow this to take place," Olmert wrote in a letter to Rabin.

Rabin told the cabinet Sunday that he has no objection to Shaath making a private trip to Jerusalem and praying at the Al-Aqsa Mosque.

Defence Ministry officials concede that Israel cannot deny Shaath or even Arafat the right to pray at Al-Aqsa, since Israel allows full religious expression to members of all faiths.

In fact, in a speech at the European Parliament in Strasbourg last December, Rabin said even Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi could pray at Al-Aqsa.

Despite that, Rabin is still opposed to Arafat praying at Al-Aqsa during his upcoming visit, officials say.

It's a kosher Whopper

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The world's first strictly kosher Burger King opened its doors on June 14 in Jerusalem's Malha Mall.

The opening of the Jerusalem restaurant followed the opening of the "Home of the Whopper" in Ra'anana a week earlier.

Although that restaurant also uses kosher products, the Ra'anana branch is open on Shabbat and does not have a kashruth certificate from the rabbinate.

The 220-seat Jerusalem restaurant will not be open on Shabbat, and as a result is certified kosher by the Jerusalem Rabbinate.

Because the restaurant is kosher, they do not serve the Whopper with cheese, although the rest of the burger's ingredients remain the same as elsewhere.

The cost of the Whopper, which according to the company is sold around the world at the rate of 1,400 a minute, is NIS 8.90 (approximately $5 Cdn).

A regular portion of french fries costs NIS 4.90 ($2.25) and a regular-sized soft drink costs NIS 3.90 ($1.80).

Yair Tamir, managing director of the Rikamor investment group that has brought the restaurants to Israel, said there are plans to open 48 Burger King restaurants here over the next five years.

Lubavitch leaders attend Rebbe's funeral

'We are all his children'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On the day of the Lubavitcher Rebbe's funeral, the neigborhood streets where his Toronto followers live were almost deserted as a large percentage of them crowded into vans, cars, planes and buses to pay their final respects to their mentor.

Rabbi Aaron Grossbaum, director of Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario, piled his wife and children into his van as soon as he heard the news of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, and drove through the night to join the thousands crowding the Crown Heights streets and the Montefiore Cemetery in Queen's, N.Y., where the Rebbe is buried next to his predecessor.

"We are all the children of the Rebbe," he explained.

"I haven't come to grips with my own feelings. We have lived with his guidance and teachings for so many years."

In accordance with Lubavitch custom, he explained, there were no eulogies, and only the simplest of ceremonies.

From the time the body of the Rebbe was returned to Lubavitch headquarters at 770 Eastern Parkway in the wee hours of a Sunday morning until the burial later the same day, grieving followers filed past the coffin, "each person sharing through his mind his affinity with the Rebbe."

At 4 p.m., he said, the body of the Rebbe was taken in a hearse to the cemetery. K'El Maaleh Rachamim and Kaddish concluded the funeral.

Then, way into the night and the next day, people filed by, asking the Rebbe to intercede for them with G-d.

Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman, director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre in North York, was another of the Torontonians who made the trek to New York.

"To us and to thousands of men, women and children, the Rebbe was father, mother and teacher.

"There is no one of the same stature, the same caring, wisdom and leadership," he said, explaining the depth of the pain and loss felt by his followers.

"Every person in every walk of life saw the Rebbe as someone who could be trusted," whose advice was given with no ulterior motive, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

Together with the pain, he said, is the Lubavitch belief in the imminent coming of the Messiah, as foretold by Rabbi Schneerson.

"So everyone took it [the death of the Rebbe] in his own way; one was crying, one was saying everything will be fine."

Rabbi Grossbaum described Rabbi Schneerson as an active and outspoken leader, who remained aware of and responsive to current situations. "He never aged. He knew that the problems of a yeshiva student in 1940 were different from those in 1960 or in 1980."

He had the ability, said Rabbi Grossbaum, "to relate to a chassidic Jew from Israel, and the next minute to a university student with hair down to his shoulders. He dealt with a serious personal problem one minute and the next minute discussed current affairs with a politician.

"At a farbrengen (a gathering where he would speak to his followers on a wide range of topics) he could speak from 9:30 at night until 2:30 in the morning, and still be full of energy."

A rebbe, he went on, is not like the CEO of a corporation. "We saw him as a man of vision and spirituality. He was devoted to his Chassidim, praying, responding to their needs, solving their problems."

These qualities can't be taught, Rabbi Grossbaum said. "You can't just go and hire someone for the position. You can't make or 'elect' a rebbe. It's a gift from G-d."

There is nobody on the horizon, he believes, "who comes close to the Rebbe's qualities as a dedicated servant of G-d."

Both Rabbis Grossbaum and Zaltzman say those in positions of responsibility in the Lubavitch movement, including communities such as Toronto, will carry on their duties guided by the wishes of the Rebbe: observance of mitzvot, fear of G-d, concern for every Jew.

It is perhaps symbolic of the personal relationship his Chassidim felt with him that even in their time of sorrow Rabbi Grossbaum remembers going to see the Rebbe as a young student just before Rosh Hashanah.

A young boy standing on the street asked the Rebbe whether he would like to hear how his toy shofar sounded. The Rebbe said he would be delighted.

"At a time of such heightened intensity, when he was praying for thousands of individuals, he still had time to spare for a little boy," Rabbi Grossbaum said.

For now, there are candles in the Lubavitch synagogues, and a shivah candle in every Lubavitch home.

"People have a lot of questions," Rabbi Zaltzman told The CJN. "But this is a time of sorrow, not the time to answer questions.

Jewish Book Awards marred by tragedy

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The sixth annual Jewish Book Awards came to a sad end June 15 with the announcement that Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum, 84, one of the prize winners, had died in Branson Hospital just two hours before the meeting.

His granddaughter Rivka Jakobovits, a music teacher, told the large gathering in the Beth Tzedec Synagogue: "My grandfather joins me in spirit at this profound moment." The Penina Rubinoff Memorial Award to Semblance and Reality, a series of essays by Rabbi Nussbaum on Messianism in biblical perspective had been presented earlier in the evening. (See obituary on Page 16).

Hy Bergel, a member of the Jewish Book Committee, and a former student of Rabbi Nussbaum when he was principal of Eitz Chaim Schools, expressed sympathy to the family and said he had visited the rabbi in hospital that afternoon. "Rabbi Nussbaum was the complete Renaissance man," Bergel said.

A total of nine awards worth $4,000 in prize money were distributed to authors from Quebec City, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston and Toronto. The growth in interest and award money was welcomed by Professor Adam Fuerstenberg, chair, who said the first ceremony six years ago saw only two awards given.

The city of Toronto should be ready to take over the mantle of the leading Jewish religious and cultural centre in Canada from Montreal, said guest speaker Professor Seymour Mayne of Ottawa, winner of the poetry award for Killing Time.

"I don't think things will pick up there [Montreal]," he said. Mayne was born and brought up in Montreal but has been living in Ontario as a professor at the University of Ottawa.

The Canadian Jewish community is not supportive of its writers, neither in buying their books, nor in other ways, Mayne said, noting that in 22 years he has been invited to speak at a Jewish school in Ontario only once, while he has spoken at non-Jewish schools in Ontario and Quebec countless times.

He has had personal experience with people who earn far more than he does who have balked at paying $10 or $15 for one of his books and have refused to give him their credit card numbers if they have no cash.

The author said he disagrees with those in the literary world who see danger ahead in Canada's multicultural policy. "In the United States it has tended to cultural separation, but this has not happened in Canada."

Esther Delisle, author of The Traitor and the Jew and winner of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Award, delighted the audience when she gave her thank-you speech in Hebrew. Her book deals with the bigotry against Jews displayed by leading French-Canadian intellectuals in the 1930s.

Moroccan prince visits Toronto

By CAROLAN HALPERN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Everyone wanted a picture with the prince; everyone wanted the prince's autograph; everyone wanted to shake his hand.

The Moroccan Jewish community of Toronto welcomed Prince Moulay Rachid, younger son of King Hassan II of Morocco, at a gala dinner recently at the Paradise Convention Centre in Vaughan.

The outpouring of affection from the crowd of 600 was manifest in the cheering and applause that greeted the prince from the time he entered the hall until his departure — both to a traditional march played by the Moroccan Arabic band invited from Montreal for the occasion.

The speeches were in French, the ambiance was Moroccan, from the traditional foods to the music and the names of Moroccan cities displayed on every table.

Moroccan Jews and Muslims gathered to celebrate the one-day visit to Toronto of a prince of a royal family that has for generations allowed its Jews freedom of worship in a country with open borders.

In welcoming Prince Rachid, Rabbi Amram Assayag of Magen David Synagogue expressed the feelings of the crowd: "The history of our people, yours and ours, is intertwined and forever inseparable. We are here in body, but our hearts remain in Morocco."

"May we ... be an example for the entire world that two different peoples can live together in peace and harmony."

In his brief address, Prince Rachid also spoke of the unique mutual respect between the two religions in Morocco, referring to the tradition of openness being upheld by his father, King Hassan II. "We are both sons of Abraham," the prince said.

The speakers during the opening ceremonies included Rabbi Yehiel Benayon of Petach Tikva-Anshei Castilla Synagogue; Simon Keslassy, president of the Moroccan Jewish Community of Toronto and vice-president of the World Gathering of Moroccan Jews; and Najib Redouane, representative of the Moroccan Muslim community of Toronto.

As people called out in Arabic, "Long live [the King of] Morocco," the huge audience responded enthusiastically, ululating and clapping.

People were so insistent on approaching the prince during dinner that he agreed to circulate among the tables, in order to personally greet as many of his admirers as possible.

After dinner, Maurice Benzacar, president of the Sephardic Association of Ontario, and Meyer Keslassy, vice-president of the Canadian Sephardic Association, presented the prince with an Inuit soapstone sculpture of a seal, inscribed as a memento of his visit to Toronto.

Louis Elisha Attias, secretary of the Moroccan Jewish Community of Toronto, told The CJN that Prince Rachid has been in New York, working on a doctoral thesis and as part of a Moroccan economic mission to the United Nations.

When it was learned that the prince would be returning to Morocco, said Attias, Simon Keslassy contacted King Hassan II, requesting permission to invite the prince to Toronto to honor him at a dinner.

"I think we are the ones the king has honored greatly" in allowing Prince Rachid to come, Attias said.

Special guests at the gala included Mr. and Mrs. Albert Reichman, who were refugees in Morocco during World War II, and Tajeddine Baddou, Moroccan Ambassador to Canada who came from Ottawa.

Armand Moyal, former cantor of Magen David Synagogue, performed traditional Moroccan and Hebrew songs.

Among the organizers of the event were Benzacar, Simon and Meyer Keslassy, and Gad Elmaleh and Albert Zrihen, president and past president of Magen David.

Israeli women, Jew and Arab, share commitment for peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Daphna Golan and Mariam Mar'i represent two sides of the same coin. Both highly educated, longtime peace activists in Israel, Golan, 36, is an Israeli Jew; Mar'i, 48, an Israeli Arab.

The two women visited Toronto recently to address local audiences in their only Canadian stop on a North American speaking tour. Golan and Mar'i took part in Sisters and Strangers: A Jewish-Arab Women's Dialogue, sponsored for the third time by the New Israel Fund (NIF).

The Fund, on whose board Mar'i serves, is a joint Israeli-North American venture which underwrites over 150 Israeli non-profit organizations dedicated to protecting civil and human rights, improving the status of women, bridging social and economic gaps, and furthering Jewish-Arab coexistence.

During an interview sandwiched between two local speaking engagements, the effects of the whirlwind tour were evident. Still adjusting to the three-hour time difference between Toronto and San Francisco, an exhausted Golan and an energized Mar'i fielded questions about the work they do in Israel.

Both women share a deep commitment to peace, human rights, women's rights and their respective communities.

They also share a rapport most evident when the talk veers away from work. After the interview, they pose for a picture on a hotel lobby sofa. Mar'i playfully offers her shoulder to a weary Golan, who briefly rests her head before resuming an animated conversation.

Golan, a Hebrew University professor and former research director of B'Tselem (an NIF grantee which monitors human rights in the territories), is the director of Bat Shalom, a feminist centre for peace and social justice in Jerusalem.

She says that the type of work she does has become easier over the years. "People looked at us as a bit weird," she recalls. "When we were saying, 'Talk to the PLO,' it was considered completely crazy. Today, there's no question about it."

"The taboos have fallen apart, and that's really what's making our work easier," adds Mar'i, Haifa University lecturer and founding president of the Acre Arab Women's Association. "If not for the commitment and belief and persistence of the women involved, we would have given up a long time ago."

Mar'i believes that the majority of people in Israel are ready for change. "Of course there are those who oppose it. Their voices are loud because I think they are so damned scared and fearful. They sense that maybe their time will be out soon," she says.

Golan picks up the threads of Mar'i's thoughts. "When the Israeli army pulled out of Gaza and Jerusalem, we thought there would be demonstrations," she says.

"Everyone was fearful," Mar'i agrees. Both women are adamant that violence is not a solution, although Mar'i carefully distinguishes "state violence" from "revolutionary violence."

"If an oppressed group is using stones to rebel against their oppression, there is no way of comparing the two," she says.

"Killing of civilians is unjustified no matter what the cause and no matter what the methods," says Golan.

"Absolutely," agrees Mar'i.

The two women are optimistic about the peace process. "It's difficult, it's thorny, it's painful, it will be a tough road; but the ball has rolled. It's up to all of us to make it work," says Mar'i.

"What [the Palestinians] have now is less than the dream of the youngest child in the Palestinian community, but we are determined to make this experience successful enough to get us on the road to real peace and to achieve the Palestinian dream for a real state," she adds.

Congress meets with Herb Gray

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prompted by concern over rumors that the investigatory and prosecutorial branches of the war crimes unit are not cooperating fully, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) met recently with Solicitor General Herb Gray to press their concerns on the war crimes issue.

"There have been troublesome rumors of dissension between the RCMP and the people responsible for prosecuting [Nazi] war criminals," said CJC executive-director Jack Silverstone. The rumors have existed in some form or other ever since the war crimes unit of the Justice Department was established in 1987, he said. "Given the results of this issue, I have concerns about every aspect of how [the war crimes portfolio] has been handled."

In a telephone interview, Gray discounted rumors of dissension. "As far as I am aware, there is currently good cooperation," he said. "I'm in contact with [Justice Minister] Allan Rock and we work closely on these kinds of matters."

Gray said that while he does not get involved in the RCMP's operational activities, the government's high priority given to the prosecution of Nazi war criminals is well known in the force.

"I meet with [Deputy Commissioner] Philip Murray and senior management of the force from time to time on general policy matters. Allan Rock and I have already stated that dealing with war criminals is a priority," he said.

"I am satisfied with the role of the RCMP," he added.

In its seven years in existence, the war crimes unit, which includes RCMP investigators, historians and Justice Department lawyers, has launched only four criminal prosecutions.

One, involving former Hungarian gendarme Imre Finta, resulted in acquittal, while two others never reached trial. Silverstone pointed out that the judge in the Michael Pawlawski case was very critical of the way in which witnesses' affidavits were taken, indicating that problems exist in the way the unit prepares cases.

Silverstone said the Congress delegation, which included president Irving Abella, met with Gray because "we want to see the investigatory and prosecutorial arms working in lockstep on this issue."

He said he had no hard evidence of dissension between the two sides but that the unit's record speaks for itself.

Silverstone said Congress wanted the minister to know "in detail about our community's interest on this issue" and to ask the minister to "set a moral tone and ensure that officials are clear about the importance the government places on this issue."

"Time is of the essence in bringing cases forward against the perpetrators of the most heinous crimes in human history," Abella said.

Montreal woman advocates for agunot

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ten years ago Evelyn Brook had never heard of agunot (Jewish women whose husbands can't or won't give them a get, or Jewish divorce).

Since then Brook, a Montreal businesswoman, has become a leading advocate for the rights of agunot.

Brook chairs the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get and serves as vice-president of the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR). She was keynote speaker at a recent board meeting of Jewish Women's Federation (JWF), a member group of the Coalition.

The agunah issue is related to the issue of Jewish continuity, Brook said. "If the Jewish community does not recognize the problems an agunah faces, then her children share those problems and will be alienated," she said.

JWF president Glennie Lindenberg related how one Toronto agunah has said she would not encourage her children to go through a Jewish marriage because of the difficulties she has faced in trying to obtain her get.

If a woman remarries under civil law, without receiving a get, she is still considered to be married to her first husband under Jewish law. Any children from a subsequent marriage are mamzerim ("illegitimate" children), and may only marry another mamzer or a convert under Jewish law, Brook explained, compared to children of unmarried women, who are not considered "illegitimate" under Jewish law.

One of the problems in the Jewish community, believes Brook, is that "so few people know they must have a Jewish divorce." She said a get is the only divorce recognized for Jews in Israel — an important point for anyone planning to live there.

She stressed the importance of becoming informed and told those attending the meeting they had an obligation to pass on the information she had shared with them. She urged the women to "use all of your influence to help agunot."

Because a get must be agreed to willingly, Brook sees the community's problem as "how to change Jewish social behavior so a man can be influenced [not forced] to give his wife a get."

To that end, vigils to draw attention to the plight of agunot were held earlier this year in seven Canadian cities. A protest was also held in Thornhill last month to show solidarity with agunah Yoni Shalev and to demand her estranged husband Uzi give her a get.

The Rabbinical Council of America, an association of Orthodox rabbis in North America, addressed the agunah issue last summer by passing a resolution stating that its members would use prenuptial agreements to ensure participation in the get process should the marriage not work out.

Rabbi Israel Lau, chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel, is supportive of prenuptial agreements, Brook said. The rabbi spoke at the opening session of a recent international meeting of ICAR which Brook attended in Israel.

Israel has an estimated 10,000 agunot.

Locally, Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, chair of Toronto's Beth Din Tzedek, is actively dealing with about half a dozen cases, he told The CJN last month. A 1987 B'nai Brith Canada study reported that 311 Canadian cases involved conflict or disagreement in procurement of the get between 1982 and 1985.

Under Canadian law, following the amendment of Canada's Divorce Act in 1990, divorcing spouses must remove all possible barriers to religious remarriage of their spouse before receiving a civil divorce. Although the law can be waived in certain circumstances, Brook feels it is wiser to adhere to it.

To utilize the law properly, "a woman must file an affidavit that she has been to a rabbi and is prepared to accept the get," said Brook. "Once the affidavit [asking that her husband remove the barriers to religious remarriage] is filed, he must respond [by giving the get] within a certain time. If he does not comply, the judge can impose sanctions."

Brook said "if he's not giving her the get, they're still married, and according to Jewish law, if they're still married, he must maintain her."

Brook, who has been happily married for 23 years, has been asked why she is "advocating divorce."

"I'm not advocating divorce at all," she insisted. "I'm praying for good marriages, [but] in the case where a marriage is not working out, Halachah says that the couple should divorce and try again [with someone else]. Everybody deserves to be in a good marriage."

Ironically, the ketubah (Jewish marriage contract) which binds agunot to bad marriages was initially conceived of to protect women, Brook said.

The ketubah dates back to Babylonian times, Brook said, when a man could have more than one wife. "With the ketubah a woman would no longer be put out onto the street or into the desert without at least one year's sustenance, which was believed to be sufficient until she found another man she could marry."

Brook said while amendments to Jewish law (such as Rabbeinu Gershom's 11th-century prohibition against bigamy) are permissible, Halachah itself is believed to be divinely given and cannot be changed.

"We have to find a way through Jewish law to free women. We want to find rabbis today like the rabbis in Babylon who were courageous enough to say, 'You have to have a contract [ketubah]'."

Black professor lashes out at Jews at Toronto forum

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews are using blacks as a "buffer" between them and those who want to exercise racist feelings against minorities, a United States college professor charged at a public meeting here June 16.

This is the reason Jews were active in the leadership of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Tony Martin, professor of Africana Studies at Wellesley College in Massachusetts, told 125 persons attending a meeting sponsored by the Black Youth Congress at the Westin Harbour Castle.

Martin said there are attempts to fire him from his university post because he introduced the Nation of Islam book The Secret Relationship between Blacks and Jews in one of his courses.

Martin spoke for 90 minutes (after arriving an hour late), repeating a string of calumnies against Jews, including the charge that they were heavily involved in the slave trade, and that they control the media.

"Nobody can slant the news like the Jews," he said, to loud applause. There were loud comments of "right on" and "the Jews again" from the audience members as he spoke.

In the discussion period, one black woman asked if there was any point in Jews and blacks sitting down together to talk things out. Aside from commenting, "That is a topical issue," Martin did not answer the question.

The chairman gave his name to this reporter as Brother Donnie X, saying he did not want his last name used. At various times, however, he was openly referred to as "Mr. McQueen" by Black Youth Congress staff.

Tony Martin

When he introduced Martin, the chairman said he (Martin) was not a member of the Nation of Islam.

The heaviest applause of the evening came from the audience when Martin lashed out at Jewish leadership in the United States for opposing affirmative action for blacks in a state case. He said it was an attempt to gain reparations for blacks after years of injustice. "And who oppes this but the Jews, the very ones who received 100 billion dollars in reparations from Germany, aside from all the free grants that the United States gives to Israel."

Reviewing the life of Marcus Garvey (the title of his talk was Garveyism and Black-Jewish Relationships), Martin said Garvey "did not trust Jews."

"Jewish organizations are so hostile to any researching of their role in the slave trade that even to mention it is an act of bigotry or anti-Semitism, as I have found out," Martin said. "It is very well documented, including work by Jewish historians."

* * *

This meeting was an uncomfortable place for a Jew to be — especially this Jew, who remembers being chased down a street in Little Rock, Arkansas, by white supremacists, after I wrote articles for the Toronto Star on the battle for integration at the high school there.

And it was an affront to journalists to make them pay to attend a publicly advertised meeting in order to report on it.

Reporters were not admitted unless they paid an admission fee of $30 for a 144-page paperback book by Martin entitled The Jewish Onslaught: Despatches from the Wellesley Battlefront. A newsletter distributed at the meeting advertised the same book for $9.95.

When I asked why reporters had to pay, I was told by the receptionist that it was the policy of the Black Youth Congress, and that all reporters were paying the fare. The reporter from the Toronto Star confirmed this, saying it was the only way to get into the meeting. The CTV-TV reporter offered the explanation: "It's a way the group has of raising funds."

United Church rejects Ross's beliefs

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The interchurch/interfaith committee of the United Church of Canada has repudiated the conspiracy theories of former Moncton teacher Malcolm Ross, calling them "serious distortions of the truth."

It further calls on all United Church members "to repent of anti-Semitic sentiments and the promulgation of historic inaccuracies and misrepresentations with regard to the Jewish people and their faith and heritage."

Rev. Brian McIntosh, chair of the church's Maritime interchurch/interfaith committee, said that in addition to reaffirming the church's opposition to anti-Semitism, the statement will raise awareness among the more than 700,000 United Church members about the conspiracy theories promulgated by Ross. "There are people who may be gullible enough to listen to his views," he said.

"We hope to use this [statement] as an educational tool, but that's a long-term process," Rev. McIntosh said.

Meanwhile, the Maritime conference of the United Church will discuss how to implement the statement when it convenes in the fall, he said.

"Deeply aware of the historic complicity of both individual Christians and whole churches in the tragedy of anti-Semitism, the committee wishes to chart a new course of justice and cooperation with the Jewish people," said the Very Rev. Robert Smith, chair of the interchurch/interfaith committee.

"The committee hopes the United Church members and other Christians who have promulgated historic inaccuracies will admit complicity in the persecution of the Jewish people and seek a more truthful and constructive dialogue with their Jewish neighbors," Rev. Smith said.

The committee also lauded Rev. Jim Leland for frequently speaking out against anti-Semitism. "[Rev.] Leland has been stalwart in his work on behalf of Jewish people and enjoys the trust of the leadership of many major Jewish organizations in Canada," Rev. Smith said.

According to news reports, Ross attended the workshop but refused to wear a yarmulke, saying it is a symbol of Judaism and that he couldn't participate in a religious ceremony that did not honor Jesus.

Ross later claimed "the workshop was an insult to my traditional Christian beliefs" and he announced he is suing the NBTA for defaming his character, saying he was ridiculed at the seminar.

It's 'Doctor' Shuster now

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian comedy legend Frank Shuster played once more to a full house last week, but this time he got more than just laughs. He got a PhD.

Shuster was awarded an honorary doctorate by the University of Toronto, his alma mater. Shuster studied English literature at University College, an affiliated college, in the late 1930s with comedy partner Johnny Wayne.

Wayne and Shuster went on to star in their own CBC television show, which ran from 1954 to 1990, and appeared on The Ed Sullivan Show a record-breaking 67 times.

Resplendent in red-and-pink academic robes, the creator of Shakespearean baseball graciously accepted his doctorate last Tuesday in Convocation Hall.

"I believe that anybody who can make a good living in Canadian show business for over 50 years deserves it," he told the crowd of 1,700.

Shuster then addressed the graduating classes of University and Victoria colleges, exhorting them to find work they enjoy so much "you don't see it as work."

He also acknowledged his debt to partner Wayne, who died in 1990. "It goes without saying that Johnny Wayne should have been part of this," he said. "This degree is meant for Wayne and Shuster."

Saturday Night Live creator Lorne Michaels was in the audience. He told The CJN he came to Toronto for the ceremony because he considered Shuster "a mentor."

Immigration board appointments

OTTAWA — Alan Rose, Ian J. Kagedan and Melissa Singer were among the 27 appointments to the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) announced by Citizen and Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi on June 15.

The three Jewish appointees are well-known for their contributions to the Jewish community and for their experience with immigration in Canada.

Rose is currently executive vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and a member of the World Jewish congress, the International Council for Russian Jewry and numerous other national and international organizations. He was made a member of the Order of Canada in 1986.

Kagedan is presently director of Government Relations of B'nai Brith Canada and was formerly assistant national executive director of CJC (Montreal). He has authored and worked on numerous publications on immigration and human rights issues, and in 1992 organized an international conference on racism, anti-Semitism and xenophobia in Toronto.

Singer is a practising lawyer who specializes in immigration. She is a member of the Association of Immigration Lawyers and was on the board of directors of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (1989-92).

Ariel's deputy mayor slams peace process

Community needs funding

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The government of Israel last week again drew the ire of a visiting spokeswoman for communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, this time for "abandoning" the regions' Jewish settlers as well as for ignoring the plight of convicted spy Jonathan Pollard.

While the criticism of Israel was sometimes harsh, the one delivering the message was a genteel, articulate and relaxed former Montrealer whose duties make her a spokeswoman for the residents of the territories.

Dina Shalit, the deputy mayor of Ariel with a porfolio for Disaspora affairs, said government financial cutbacks have led to reduced services in West Bank settlements. As a result, the approximately 175 communities in the territories have urgent needs for day care services, education facilities, first-aid centres and other social programs, she said.

Meanwhile, the "Jewish establishment" continues to refuse to allocate money raised in the Diaspora for these communities, she said. Comparing the 130,000 Jews of Judea, Samaria and Gaza to Pollard, she said "we've all been abandoned by the government of Israel."

Speaking to about 65 people at the Zionist Centre on Marlee Avenue, Shalit said the territories are vital for Israel's security. And acknowledging the presence there of Elaine Zeitz, Pollard's wife, she called on the Jewish state to use its influence with the U.S. government to "lighten the cruel and unusual punishment" handed the former U.S. intelligence officer.

Turning back to her main topic, Shalit said Judea and Samaria form a "stone wall of defence" between potential Arab invaders to the east and the Israeli heartland. Furthermore, they provide Israel with early warning that would make a surprise attack impossible, she asserted.

The current peace process is "misguided," Shalit continued, asserting that the PLO has repeatedly breached the Declaration of Principles (DoP) signed by PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last September at the White House.

Arafat violated the agreement in a South African mosque when he called for a jihad (holy war) for Jerusalem. Then on May 20, two Israeli soldiers were killed near the new Gaza border and Palestinian officials refused to search for and apprehend the fleeing murderers.

Arafat's most recent breach of the DoP came when he issued a declaration ostensibly nullifying Israeli law in Judea, Samaria and Gaza. That notice was printed on a PLO letterhead that featured a map of "Palestine" that included all of Israel, she said.

These incidents merely confirm that Arafat has retained the goal of creating a Palestinian state within the borders of Israel, with Jerusalem as its capital, Shalit maintained.

The residents of Ariel oppose the current peace talks because they play into the PLO's step by step plan to eradicate Israel. The Israeli public has become disillusioned with the process, she continued, pointing to a recent poll that showed 62 percent of Israelis, and 70 per cent of Jews, oppose the process.

Shalit aimed a barb as well at the "Jewish establishment," saying it supports Jewish communities everywhere around the world except in Judea and Samaria.

"What crimes did we commit to be victims of a Jewish boycott?," she asked. "This is our land. The issue is patrimony. We have come back to the land because we have a right to the land."

Putting on her other hats as executive director of the Ariel Development Fund and of the Israel Community Development Foundation (ICDF), formed in 1990 to provide for the welfare needs of communities, she solicited financial help for social service programs.

Shalit's statements were preceded by brief remarks from Zeitz. The Toronto resident said her husband's case highlights troublesome developments for Israel. Pollard received the same life sentence for passing information to a U.S. ally, Israel, as someone convicted for spying for the United States' enemies, she said.

If Pollard can be characterized by former defence secretaries Caspar Weinberger and Les Aspin as a traitor, "who's the enemy?" she asked.

"As long as Israel is so characterized, then the sword of Damocles hangs over the head of the Jewish people," she asserted.

LIKUD LINKS ARMS AROUND JERUSALEM

Several thousand Likud party and right wing supporters marked the 27th anniversary of the Six Day War with a big demonstration in Jerusalem protesting what in their view is the government's intention to make concessions to the Palestinians on the status of Jerusalem. The demonstrators gathered at Jerusalem's city hall and created a human chain down to the Jaffa Gate at the Old City Wall. [Israpet photo]

U.S. black leaders criticized for not denouncing Farrakhan

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan is using anti-Semitism and scapegoating tactics to gain the support of segments of the black community who feel under siege, according to New York representative. Major Owens, an outspoken member of the Congressional Black Caucus.

And although he was speaking at a forum last Wednesday that addressed the status of black-Jewish relations, he said that such meetings are "absurd" and "ridiculous" because the recent crises between the communities has been created by "the systematic effort of the Nation of Islam to focus on Jews and target them and make them scapegoats."

Owens' remarks came one day after a black leadership summit convened by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which generated controversy because of Farrakhan's presence there. Owens did not attend the summit.

The forum Owens addressed was sponsored by the Institute for Public Affairs, the public policy and advocacy wing of the Orthodox Union.

Owens cited examples of strong Jewish support for black mayoral candidates across the country and communications mogul Walter Annenberg's recent multimillion dollar donation to the United Negro College Fund, to illustrate that the split between blacks and Jews has been manufactured by Farrakhan.

Louis Farrakhan

Owens said that the use of hatred by demagogues such as Farrakhan and his former aide Khalid Abdul Muhammad "must be confronted aggressively."

Owens criticized black leaders for not denouncing Farrakhan forcefully enough.

"The level of denunciation, the level of criticism has been too low," he said. "There is a need for an aggressive counterattack, a countervailing force, to move against a force which is seeking to exploit the vulnerability of African-Americans."

Owens stressed that the danger of Farrakhan is not to the Jewish community, but to the black community, which will isolate itself if it does not denounce Farrakhan and others who spread hate.

"The danger to the black community is because we are moving into a situation where we are going to isolate ourselves from our long-term coalition partners," Owens said, referring to Jews. "If blacks do not appreciate, if they turn their back on their coalition partners, who else will ever make a coalition with them?"

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

SHINDLER — SHINDMAN

With the successful launching of Schindler's List, Schindler has become a familiar surname. It is a German word meaning shingler.

It is not to be confused with the more common Jewish surname Shindman, which means a person who flays animal skins and is the equivalent of the English name Skinner.

KADISH — KADISHEVICH

Kaddish is the memorial prayer recited as part of the ritual service by a mourner. It also has been extended to refer to a son who in the fullness of time will be reciting the memorial prayer for a deceased parent.

It may be responsible for the name Cadesky, although a more likely source is the Village of Kadysz in Poland.

Reform, Conservative win court battle in Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The High Court of Justice recently ruled that the Ministry of Religious Affairs must allocate grants to the Reform and Conservative movements in Israel.

The ruling came down following a petition filed before the court by the two movements, alleging that they suffered discrimination at the hands of the Religious Affairs Ministry, which they said has provided grants only to Orthodox organizations.

At stake in the ruling were sums in excess of some $300,000, which must now be distributed to the Conservative and Reform movements.

The Reform and Conservative movements run thriving congregations in different parts of the country and organize training programs for rabbis from abroad, who often must study in Israel before qualifying for leadership positions.

Rabbi Ehud Bandel, a spokesman for the Conservative movement, described the court ruling as "a big step forward in the direction of religious pluralism in Israel."

Palestinian says PLO was wrong in siding with Iraq

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The PLO should publicly admit that it was wrong in siding with Iraq during the Gulf War, a leading Palestinian economist has said.

Prof. Hislam Awartani, a Palestinian delegate to Mideast peace talks on the economy and an economist at An-Najah University, said only through such a public admission can Palestinians hope to get badly-needed financial aid from the Gulf states.

Awartani, speaking last month at a Hebrew University conference on the PLO, said Palestinian leaders have admitted privately that they took the wrong stand on the Gulf crisis.

"But this does not help. They have to say it in public. I wish the Palestinian leadership would come out bravely and openly and say 'We were wrong on the Gulf crisis.' I'm sure that if they did this, the Gulf states could play an important role in aiding the Palestinian self-government," he said.

Awartani, who heads the economic department of the Centre for Palestinian Research and Studies in Nablus, also expressed apprehension about PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat's commitment to democracy.

"We hope we will end up with an institutional government and not a one-man show. We hope Tunis takes Palestinians seriously in their commitment to democracy.

"Democracy is the only safeguard for preventing white elephant projects and for preventing the establishment of an 'Arafat Family Trust,' " Awartani said in response to an audience question.

Awartani was one of several Palestinian speakers at the conference who reiterated the desire for a democratic government and openly debated Arafat's intentions.

Prof. Mahti Abdul Hadi, a close associate of Palestinian delegation head Faisal Husseini, maintained that Arafat is committed to the letter of the Declaration of Principles.

"He wants to deliver," Hadi said. "He has told us many times that he does not plan to become another Grand Mufti of Palestine [the leader who led the Palestinians to defeat in 1948].

"At the same time, Arafat has told us that he does not plan to become another [former Soviet leader Mikhail] Gorbachev — someone who delivers and departs. Does this imply that he wants to become [Russian president Boris] Yeltsin — someone who can play the game of democracy, crush the opposition and receive the funding and backing of the West? This remains to be seen."

Hebrew University professor Yehoshafat Harkabi, a former head of Israel's Intelligence Branch, warned Israeli leaders not to underestimate the Palestinian desire and need for democracy.

"Some of our leaders think that it is simpler to deal with Chairman Arafat and that elections might embarrass him. Some argue that democratic elections are foreign to Arabs. They point to their recent visit to Oman, an Arab state that seems to be run impressively without elections, and they think that this would suit the Palestinians," Harkabi said.

"That is a big mistake. Palestinians will prove themselves to be the most democratic people among the Arab peoples. They are acquainted with democracy, partly through the Israeli example."

Harkabi added that Palestinian elections will pose some serious problems for Israel, including the need to redeploy the army out of major population centres (as stipulated in the Oslo accord). But Harkabi argued that a democratically-elected leadership "is the only safety valve against terrible internecine wars among the Palestinians. Only an authentic leadership will be in a position to restrain such developments," he said.

The conference, entitled The PLO and Israel: From Armed Conflict to Political Settlement — 1964-1994, was organized by the Hebrew University's Truman Research Institute, and funded with the support of the Canadian government.

CARMIEL DANCE FESTIVAL

The hills above the Knesset are the site of the 7th Dance Festival which begins in the northern town of Carmiel at the beginning of July. Of all the events which crowd the country's summer calendar, the festival is usually described as the most Israeli experience of them all, despite the cosmopolitan flavor lent by dance troupes from places as far afield as New Zealand and South America. Seen here is a preview of one of the 1,200 dance troupes who will perform at the festival. [Isranet photo]

Palestinian collaborators may face death sentences

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Some Palestinians who collaborated with Israel's Shin Bet security services may be put to death, according to Freih Abu Medein, the newly named justice minister of the Palestinian governing council.

According to Medein, the death penalty may apply to those collaborators whose activities led directly or indirectly to the deaths of other Palestinians.

But Medein also said the Palestinian authorities may decide to pardon those who turn themselves in and pledge to abandon their work with the Shin Bet.

Last week, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said Israel might delay the release of Palestinian prisoners if Palestinian authorities decide to prosecute individuals suspected of collaborating with Israel.

Two collaborators, meanwhile, in an address to the Knesset last week, accused the Shin Bet of failing to honor its promises of financial assistance, forcing them into extreme monetary difficulties.

They said there are some 7,000 collaborators holding documentation from Israeli authorities attesting to their status.

They also complained that under the terms of the Cairo agreement for implementing Palestinian self-rule, Israel is now freeing Palestinians imprisoned for hunting down suspected collaborators.

Palestinian security officials recently announced they would not tolerate individual vendettas against suspected collaborators.

Since the Palestinian uprising began in December 1987, an estimated 800 to 1,000 Palestinians suspected of collaborating with Israel have been killed by fellow Palestinians.

Women's conference set

MONTREAL — A number of leading national Jewish women's organizations will attend the International United Nations World Conference on Women to be held in Beijing in September, 1995.

The conference will look at the advancement of women through its theme of Equality, Development and Peace. Three previous conferences have been held in Mexico City, Copenhagen and Nairobi.

Hadassah-WIZO national president Judy Mandleman called a recent meeting to begin planning for the Beijing conference and its non-governmental organizations forum.

She said many women have expressed interest in the conference. For more information contact any of the following organizations:

New hate crimes law introduced

While B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights considers the proposal "an important first step in addressing the challenge posed by hate mongers and those who act on their inspiration," the League feels that it is by no means sufficient.

Mark Sandler, senior legal counsel for the League, wants the Criminal Code amended, based, he said, on a model suggested by the Anti-Defamation League in the United States and in force in 47 American states, the District of Columbia and federal jurisdictions.

This, he explained, would include penalty enhancement provisions, as well as a specific range of sentences (for instance, if assault is subject to a six-month imprisonment, one motivated by hate would automatically be subject to 12 months.)

As well, the League would like to see the nature of some offences changed.

"Synagogue desecration is now prosecuted as mischief to public property, the same as if someone broke into their neighbor's car. We would like to see it changed to institutional vandalism," said Sandler.

"This would not only send a stronger message to perpetrators of hate crimes, but would be reflected on the criminal record, which is what law enforcement officers have told us they would like to see."

Deterrent effect

Det. Sgt. Wayne Cotgreave of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Hate Crimes Unit, told The CJN that from the unit's perspective, "it is encouraging when the government or any organization increases its involvement in combatting hate."

He said he feels there will be a deterrent effect from the more stringent sentencing.

For the past 18 months, he said, if officers have found that a crime has been motivated by hate, that fact has been put in the criminal record, and prosecutors told, so that they can include the information when presenting their case in court.

This new procedure will also enable the police to plot statistics on hate crimes.

An initial report came out at the end of 1993, Cotgreave said. At the end of June, there will be another six-month report, which for the first time will enable comparisons to be made as to the frequency and characteristics of this type of crime.

The hate crime provisions are part of an omnibus bill on sentencing reform, which will also include alternatives to jail time for those who commit non-violent crimes, stiffer sentences for those who abuse a position of trust, recognition of the over-representation of native peoples in prisons, and victim input at parole or probation hearings.

There will also be for the first time a statement of purpose and principles for sentencing; the objectives of sentencing will include the rehabilitation of offenders, restitution, separating offenders from society if necessary, and deterring the offender and others from committing crimes.

Israel, Vatican launch full diplomatic ties

Exchanging ambassadors

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Vatican announced an agreement on June 15 establishing full diplomatic relations, with the Catholic Church being allowed to participate in efforts to determine the future of Jerusalem.

"The Holy See and the State of Israel, in accordance with Article 14 of the Fundamental Agreement signed by them on 30 December 1993, agree to establish full diplomatic relations, effective from 15 June 1994, at the level of Apostolic Nunciature on the part of the Holy See, and Embassy on the part of the State of Israel," read a joint protocol signed on the evening of June 14 in Jerusalem and released at a news conference the next day. The signatories were Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin and the Vatican's Archbishop Andre de Montezemolo.

Rabbi David Rosen, one of the negotiators of the Vatican-Israel agreement, said the agreement was an affirmation of the dramatic improvement in relations between Roman Catholics and Jews.

"It will affect the way Jews are viewed within the Catholic world and the way Jews feel they are viewed within the Catholic world," Rabbi Rosen said.

In the fundamental agreement signed on December 30, Israel and the Vatican agreed to establish full diplomatic relations within four months after the accord was ratified. At first, Israeli officials said, the Vatican suggested that both countries be represented by emissaries of their governments or leaders.

"Many skeptics believed that it would be difficult, maybe impossible, to establish full diplomatic relations with the Vatican without a comprehensive peace agreement in the Middle East," Beilin said.

But Israel insisted that full diplomatic relations be established with ambassadors, the officials said. The two governments exchanged ambassador-level representatives about six weeks ago — Shmuel Hadas on the Israeli side and Archbishop Montezemolo for the Vatican. They began their job as ambassadors the same day as the agreement was signed.

The Vatican will open its embassy in Jaffa, Archbishop Montezemolo said. "It is effective from today," he said. "I will be ambassador and remain apostolic delegate to Israel, Palestine, Jordan and Cyprus."

The Vatican has expressed interest in participating in talks regarding the future of Jerusalem. "We acknowledge, of course, that there is an interest of the Christians and among them the Catholic Church in speaking about the holy places of Jerusalem," Beilin said at the news conference. "There is an interest by the Holy See to be part of the religious solution for Jerusalem when this issue is on the agenda for a permanent solution."

Beilin said that the secret letter by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres released earlier this month, which implied that Israel recognized the PLO's supervision of Muslim and Christian holy places, does not affect the Vatican. "There is no hint [in the agreement] that the holy places will be handled only by the Palestinians," he said. "All religions will have to participate in this solution."

But Beilin acknowledged that the Vatican had not been aware of a secret letter on the status of Jerusalem written by Peres to late Norwegian foreign minister Johan Jorgen Holst, and that it was part of the PLO-Israel negotiations.

An Israeli source involved in the Vatican talks said no specifics have been completed over how the church will participate in talks on Jerusalem. So far, the Vatican has been offered participation in multilateral talks that deal with religious sites.

For his part, Archbishop Montezemolo said the future of Jerusalem's Christian sites will be dealt with by Israel, Jordan and the Palestinians. "This is a very complicated issue," he said. "We have very good relations with the Palestinian side. We have our own dialogue, nothing official for the time being."

Beilin said one proposal likely to be discussed during the negotiations regarding Jerusalem would be to keep it under Israeli sovereignty while dividing the city into boroughs, each with the power of administration. "We will have to take into account the special needs of the large Palestinian population," he said.

Beilin said the Vatican and Israel decided to establish an economic and judicial committee to resolve outstanding issues. The economic committee will be headed by the Finance Ministry's Ehud Kaufman and the jurisdiction committee will be headed by Zvi Terlow. The work of the two committees is expected to take two years.

Repeat of Hebron attack seen as a possibility

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — There is a growing likelihood that Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip will commit desperate acts of violence reminiscent of the Hebron massacre.

That was the view expressed last month by Hebrew University Prof. Ehud Sprinzak, an expert on Israel's radical right.

While the mainstream right in Israel if fully committed to fighting the Oslo accord through democratic means, Jewish settlers are feeling a growing sense of anxiety that may drive some individuals to acts of violence, said Sprinzak, author of The Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right.

"I don't think there is an organized, sophisticated Jewish underground," he said. "But the explosive potential within the settlements is constantly rising as the sense of anxiety and desperation increases."

For religious settlers in particular, the Oslo accord is a combination of personal, ideological and theological disasters, said Sprinzak. "For a hard-core of 20,000 to 30,000 religious settlers, the agreement is seen as a rebellion against God. Some of them feel the need to sanctify God's name."

Sprinzak speculated this is what drove Baruch Goldstein to his desperate act — and could drive others to violence.

"The determined reaction of the Israeli government [in the aftermath of the Hebron massacre] was important," he added. "A decisive act by the government can reduce the chance of an explosion."

Sprinzak, who was speaking at a Hebrew University conference, said the success of the Oslo accord will mean the "political death of the Israeli right.

"A Greater Land of Israel constitutes the very definition of the right wing in Israel."

Knesset member Ariel Sharon's most recent leadership challenges to Opposition leader Binyamin Netanyahu is a symptom of the crises in the Israeli right, said Sprinzak. However, a change in leadership is unlikely to alter the fortunes of the right or increase its impact on Israeli public opinion, he added.

"Ironically the Israeli right knows it can only be saved by one camp: the Palestinians.

"The Israeli public will not oppose the peace process out of any commitment to the settlers," said Sprinzak. "It is only terrorism that may turn Israelis against the accord — and save the right wing."

SATMAR REBBE VISITS ISRAEL

The anti-Zionist Satmar Rebbe Moshe Teitelbaum came to Israel on June 7 to visit Israel's Satmar community. It was his first visit in 11 years. Fifty leading rabbis and 30 journalists were at the airport to greet the Satmar Rebbe along with no less than 2,000 followers that came with him from the U.S. Chaotic scenes were witnessed as the Rebbe tried to get through the crowd to his limousine. One hundred thousand people crowded the streets around Mea Shearim's Shabbat Square chanting "Long live our master, teacher and rabbi, righteous man of our generation" as the Rebbe's first speech of his two week stay was due to begin. In his speech he urged Israelis not to take part in the life of the State of Israel — that they should refuse to pay taxes, that they should refuse to serve in the army, that they should not collect state benefits nor vote in any election. Here Rabbi Teitelbaum (with white beard) is seen on arrival at Ben Gurion Airport surrounded by his supporters. [IPPA photo]

Knesset passes first national health plan

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Following 22 hours of deliberations, the Knesset passed into law on June 15 a national health insurance plan that will insure all Israeli citizens.

The Knesset voted 68 to 0, with 27 abstentions from the Likud benches.

Amir Peretz, chair of the Knesset committee that steered the law through, described the new health legislation as "the bill of rights of the Israeli citizen."

The national health insurance law, which has been decades in the making, has not been without its share of controversy.

A strong backer of health reform, Chaim Ramon stepped down as health minister in late January when the Cabinet rejected an original form of the bill.

The Cabinet at that time had not wanted to break the link between the Histadrut trade union federation and the Kupat Holim Clalit (General Sick Fund), the country's largest health maintenance organization, which currently insures some 70 per cent of the Israeli population.

But Ramon then left the Labor Party to run for the post of secretary general of the Histadrut. When he won that nationwide election, he succeeded in ousting the Labor Party from its traditional control of the federation.

The June 15 Knesset vote, which provided a second victory for Ramon, will break Histadrut's hold over the country's health services, a hold it has enjoyed since pre-State days.

That control often forced large segments of the population to retain union membership in order to gain health insurance.

The linkage between Histadrut and Kupat Holim also led to a situation in which the government was forced to subsidize trade union health care without being able to exercise control over how monies were spent.

That state of affairs came to a crisis in recent days, when Kupat Holim was reported on the verge of bankruptcy. The government, in turn, found itself caught between its responsibility to see that millions of Israelis were not left without health services and a reluctance to bail out the fund.

U.S. not expected to broker peace deal

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A recently completed internal Foreign Ministry study warns that neither Israel nor Syria can count on the United States to bridge their differences, according to Foreign Ministry sources.

Pointing to perceived "flip-flops" and "lack of determination" in Washington's handling of global hot spots, the study, issued by the Foreign Ministry's newly-established Policy Planning division, seems to confirm criticism of the Clinton Administration, namely, that foreign policy setbacks in different parts of the world could undermine its effectiveness as a Middle East peacemaker.

Sources insist the document does not address whether Israel or Syria needs to modify its substantive positions at the peace table to reach an accord, since it concentrates on U.S. policymaking.

The document sought to learn lessons from how the Clinton Administration handled three areas deemed of interest to the United States: China, North Korea and Haiti.

"The lesson for Israel from all of this should be that we cannot expect the U.S. will do our work for us. As past secretaries of state have liked to say, 'The U.S. cannot want peace more than the parties themselves.' Israel cannot count on American determination to ensure the success of the talks," a Foreign Ministry official said.

It appears that one of the study's operational conclusions would be to hold direct Israel-Syria back-channel talks.

Israel has repeatedly called on Syria to hold such discussions but officials insist Damascus has repeatedly rejected the appeal.

Shekter gets scholarship

"The wonderful thing about it is that I don't have a heart problem any more," he said. "I have an immunological problem now, I suppose."

Toronto General Hospital does at least 25 heart transplants per year, according to Shekter. "It's not what most people think it is," he said. "It's becoming more commonplace. It's not a big deal, medically. It's certainly a lot less intense than I had expected."

The operation couldn't have come a moment too soon for Shekter, who was notified in February that he was one of 21 finalists from some 300 applicants across Canada for the U of T's national scholarship award. After a round of interviews in April, he was chosen as one of six winners. "Before the operation, walking across campus six times a day just wouldn't have been possible for me. I wouldn't have made it. So it was well-timed."

The scholarship consists of one free year of residence, $7,500 per year for up to four years, and admission into a program of choice. Shekter already knows what he wishes to study — computer science and physics — and plans a career in computer animation and graphics.

Interestingly, other members of his family are already in the entertainment field. His father, Mark Shekter, is a television and film writer, and his mother, Louise Shekter, is a television writer, producer and director. His sister Katherine, who is only 12, has begun a lucrative part-time career as an actress.

Shekter said it is important for a would-be organ donor to do more than sign the donor card attached to his or her driver's license. "Although the hospital may have the right to your organs, it won't use them without your family's permission," he said. "So make sure to tell your next of kin of your intentions."

There will be no issue of July 14.

The News in Brief

Romanian Jewry Elects New Leader

IASI, Romania — Some six weeks after the death of Chief Rabbi Moses Rosen, Romania's Jewish community has elected a new leader.

The executive committee of the Federation of Romanian Jewish Communities last week unanimously elected Professor Nicolae Cajal as the federation's new president.

For more than four decades, Rabbi Rosen was both religious and organizational leader of Romanian Jewry. Following his death on May 6, communal leaders agreed to a separation of the two powers.

The election of Cajal, which was reported on Romanian television and radio stations, was greeted warmly both within and outside the country's Jewish community.

During interviews with television and radio stations, Cajal acknowledged the presence of anti-Semitism in the country and suggested that one way to combat it was to publicize the activities of Romania's Jews in the fields of culture and science.

Israel To Keep Friendly Ties With Italy

JERUSALEM — Israel will maintain friendly relations with the Italian government, but will temporarily refrain from contact with Rome's five neo-fascist ministers, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres has told his Italian counterpart Antonio Martino in Luxembourg.

"There are no plans for contact with the five at this time for the time being," an Israeli official said.

Peres's decision fell short of a more activist position favored by some in the Foreign Ministry who want to cool overall relations with Rome, and even temporarily recall Ambassador Avi Pazner. Norway, taking a tougher stance than Israel, has said it would boycott the neo-fascist ministers.

According to participants in the talks, the Italian foreign minister pledged that the Italian government would be "the most pro-Israel in 20 years" and said there is "no nostalgia for Fascism" in Italy.

Israelis Banned From Jericho

JERUSALEM — Israelis, with the exception of journalists, will be banned from Jericho during the arrival of PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, a senior IDF commander said.

Maj-Gen. Ilan Biran, head of army central command, said Route 90, the two-lane highway that runs from Jerusalem to Tiberias, will be closed at Jericho. Israelis will be asked to use the dirt road that bypasses the area of Palestinian authority.

One reason for the ban on Israelis, Biran said, is to avoid a clash between Arafat supporters and Israelis seeking to attack the PLO leader. "This includes those people who are crazies," he told a news conference.

Gazans Support Cairo Accord: Poll

JERUSALEM — A new poll shows the Cairo agreement has the support of 69 per cent of Gazans, indicating a reversal of the wane in support for the peace process during the previous months.

The Cairo accords have the support of 57 per cent of the Palestinians overall, (51 per cent outside Gaza), compared with levels of support below 50 per cent in recent months.

The new monthly survey was published on last week by the Centre for Palestine Research and Studies (CPRC) in Nablus and was conducted on May 31 among 1,974 respondents interviewed face-to-face.

The demand for political elections has risen from its already high figure to 80 per cent. However the poll also shows that in Gaza, Fatah would win 52 per cent of the votes, the first time it has scored an outright majority in the polls since they began in September.

Support for Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Islamic independents in political, as opposed to local, elections stands at 19 per cent in Gaza.

IDF Denies Human Rights Report

TEL AVIV — The Israel Defense Force has denied a report by an American human rights monitoring organization claiming Israeli interrogators torture Palestinian detainees to obtain confessions of wrongdoing.

An IDF spokesman issued a statement last week stating that the use of torture or violence against detainees is forbidden under Israeli law. He added that any confession obtained by such means would be inadmissible as evidence.

The denial was issued in reply to a report published earlier in the week by the U.S.-based Human Rights Watch, which charged "a systematic pattern of ill-treatment and torture" in the Israeli handling of Palestinian detainees.

In issuing the denial, the IDF spokesman stressed the safeguards already in place to prevent such mistreatment and added that the number of complaints has been minimal.

But Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, who was questioned about the human rights report, acknowledged that Israel had probably committed some human rights violations during its 27 years of administering the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Leket: No Plans to Bypass UJA

JERUSALEM — Acting Jewish Agency Chairman Yehiel Leket tried to throw cold water on the sparks set alight by Treasurer Hanan Ben-Yehuda with regard to the Agency's relationship with its Diaspora fundraisers last week.

"There is no intention on the part of the Agency to circumvent the UJA and set up its own fundraising mechanism in the United States," Leket stated before boarding a flight to Moscow. "Any attempt to create a crisis atmosphere is artificial."

But one agency official said the federations abroad are already abuzz following Ben-Yehuda's remarks that, unless the agency keeps the exclusive right to decide where the money goes, it would begin raising money abroad through its own officials. Ben-Yehuda was speaking following a visit with Leket to the United States, where they negotiated terms for a new agreement between the federations and the Agency.

Responding to Ben-Yehuda's remarks that the UJA had agreed only to a three-year arrangement, until 1997, Leket said a five-year agreement is in the works. He added that the fundraisers would apparently also agree to give the agency 50 per cent of the money raised abroad and to continue the exclusivity arrangement.

Rabin Meets Canadian Defence Minister

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Yitzhak Rabin told his visiting Canadian counterpart, David M. Collenette, that Canada is the only country in the world that has not yet ended its embargo on military sales to Israel. Rabin also noted at their meeting on June 14 that Canada and Israel enjoy close and good relations and that Israel is prepared to cooperate with Canada's defence establishment.

The Canadian defence minister said his government is currently reviewing its policies regarding international defence links. Collenette added that in his opinion, his government would be prepared to participate in a peacekeeping force after peace is achieved between Israel and Syria.

Police Quash Immigrant Scam

JERUSALEM — Investigators arrested 11 people on June 14 suspected of "importing immigrants" from the CIS in order to pocket the absorption basket funds and profit from other rights the newcomers received. The immigrants later returned to the CIS.

The 11, from the Dan region, were arrested following lengthy intelligence work by detectives, particularly regarding the counterfeiting of documents and identity cards for use in obtaining immigrant status.

Holocaust Exhibit Tours Japan

NEW YORK — To combat a rising wave of anti-Semitism in Japan, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre recently arranged a 10-day exhibit on the Holocaust, that was displayed in Tokyo's City Hall.

The Wiesenthal Centre project, titled The Courage to Remember, drew an estimated 85,000 visitors during its May 10-20 display in Tokyo; it then went on display in other Japanese cities.

Many of those who saw the Tokyo display waited two hours to get in to see the 60-panel exhibit, according to Gerald Margolis, director of the Wiesenthal Centre and creator of the exhibition.

South African Jew Named To Court

JOHANNESBURG — Arthur Chaskalson, 62, a Jewish lawyer and a prominent expert on human rights, has been appointed the first president of South Africa's new Constitutional Court.

The court's task is to adjudicate constitutional issues, including the Bill of Rights, and to approve South Africa's new constitution, which must be drafted within two years to conform to democratic principles and international norms.

Chaskalson has long been a high-profile human rights activist. He was an adviser on constitutional matters to the African National Congress, now the majority party in Parliament.

World Cup arrives in U.S.

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Soccermania is spreading to the four corners of the globe. Several billion emotional soccer aficionados impatiently awaited the official kick-off of the 1994 World Cup.

For the first time in its history, until July 17, the United States is hosting the competition. All games are being broadcast live on radio and television in 190 countries, for a total of 16,500 hours of coverage.

Because soccer does not have a high profile on the very competitive North American sports scene, the organizers of this World Cup have decided to go all out in trying to improve the image of the popular sport with the critical North American public.

Montrealer George Schwartz, one of Canada's leading soccer specialists, says that the directors of the FIFA, the international soccer federation, have made some necessary, if unexpected rule changes to make a better show of the matches played by the 24 national teams which have reached the World Cup.

Schwartz, an internationally-known jeweller, has since 1986 been a commentator for the principal international soccer matches on the Reseau des Sports — the francophone equivalent of TSN. He has represented the Canadian Soccer Federation — which has some 400,000 members — on the executive council of FIFA.

Will the rule changes really strengthen the game? "We hope so," says Schwartz. "For example, the inflexible offside rule which quite often penalizes forwards will now be enforced only if absolutely necessary. If there is any doubt, the referee will rule in favor of the forward ... The referees have also been explicitly instructed to severely penalize any tackles from behind."

According to Schwartz, the directors of FIFA have also made other specific changes to favor more offensive game strategies. "From now on, the defenders will be severely penalized if they waste time by passing the ball back to their goaltender," he says. "The goaltender will have to immediately kick the ball downfield towards the opposing zone."

Some important changes have also been made in the point system. The winning team of each match gets three points; if two teams play to a draw, each gets one point. The top two teams in each group will get to the second round. But — and this is new — the four third-place teams with the highest number of points will also qualify for the second round.

"This innovation will allow us to introduce some parity to this World Cup. For the first time, tough, outstanding teams, who could be eliminated because of ... a tie game, for example, will be able to advance. So the teams that are traditionally the strongest ... will not have a monopoly and automatically reach the second round," says Schwartz.

Which teams started as the favorites in this World Cup? "Several teams have returned very well-prepared physically, such as Germany and the Netherlands," Schwartz says. But, he adds, there are less highly rated teams which may well surprise us.

But how can these "small" teams compete with the big "dinosaurs" of this World Cup? "Don't forget that a number of players on the 'small' teams do not play for their country of origin," he says. "They sometimes play for prestigious first-division European teams."

One of the greats missing from this World Cup is the team from France. To reach the final round, the French needed a draw in their match against Israel last October. But the unpredictable Israeli team handed them a bitter 2-0 defeat. The Israeli team did not qualify for the World Cup matches.

"I believe that, especially in view of the large number of Russian immigrants who have recently settled in Israel, the level of soccer in that small country has a good chance of improving visibly in the years to come," Schwartz predicts.

On June 17, the curtain rose in nine U.S. cities on the big soccer show. Make way for the World Cup . . . and for goals!

This is an abridged version of an article which appeared in the Montreal edition of CJN (June 6) in French. Translation by CJN staff.

Rebbe's will charts course for future of Lubavitch

By YORI YANOVER

The late Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson wrote his will in February 1988, three days after the death of his wife, Rebetzen Chaya Mushka. No doubt her departing brought to his mind thoughts of his own mortality. Two years earlier, the Lubavitch movement had been entangled in a legal struggle over the estate of its previous rebbe. Rabbi Schneerson was all too aware of the needless diversions, not to speak of losses, such struggles cause.

He set out to devise a will which would most effectively chart out his vision of the Lubavitch movement's future. The document he produced is short and appears on its face to be concerned with purely technical, even bureaucratic issues. This appearance of simplicity is another tribute to the man's genius.

In effect, the will answers all the questions Chassidim and non-Chassidim may have raised in recent years, concerning the rebbe's messianic message. It also charts the Lubavitch movement's future for many years to come.

Did the Lubavitcher Rebbe consider himself the miraculous Mashiach, who would some day recover from the ravages of old age and attain eternal youth? Check out the will:

"I request that my debts, my funeral expenses (including, but not limited to, the cost of a suitable monument), and my administration expenses be paid as promptly as shall be practicable."

Those lines were clearly written by a man preparing for the eventuality of his own death. He wishes to conclude his business among the living in a proper and upright way. He has no delusions of metamorphosis.

It is difficult to imagine how his followers who thought otherwise, and who are of sound mind, might fail to see the calm acceptance of mortality which emanates from those simple lines.

What about his failure to appoint an heir?

Let's examine first those appointments which are made in the will:

The movement's spokesman, Rabbi Yehuda Krinsky, is named as the executor of the will. Rabbi Krinsky is, perhaps, the quintessential "anti-Mashichist" (meaning he objected to the wildfire messianic preaching practised by some Lubavitchers). He is associated with the emissaries of the movement and is deeply hated by a large segment of Lubavitchers who reside in Crown Heights, Brooklyn and other large Lubavitch enclaves.

Rabbi Krinsky's rival in the secretariat, Rabbi Leib Groner, was edged out by the Rebbe in the most elegant, even amusing manner. Not only was he effectively stripped of any real authority following Rabbi Schneerson's departing, but he was also made to sign as witness to the veracity of the will. The Lubavitcher Rebbe was well aware, apparently, of Rabbi Groner's penchant for back-room mischief, and was insuring against it, six years in advance.

The will states: "I devise and bequeath my Residuary Estate to Agudas Chassidei Chabad (Association of Chabad Chassidim)."

Rabbi Krinsky has been secretary of the Association since 1972. Its chair is Rabbi Avraham Shemtov, Lubavitch emissary to Pennsylvania, as well as to Washington, D.C.'s Capitol Hill and the White House. Rabbi Shemtov, who is named as alternate executor of the will, is another key "anti-Machichist."

The Lubavitcher Rebbe, in effect, recognized the Association of Chabad Chassidim (AGUCH) as the institutional leadership of the Lubavitch movement. In short: they sign the cheques.

Neither Rabbi Krinsky nor Rabbi Shemtov is considered a pretender to the throne of the Rebbe.

How, then, is Lubavitch going to get its next rebbe?

It isn't.

There could be only two reasons why the late Rabbi Schneerson neglected to groom a successor: he either forgot or he didn't want to.

Obviously, few of those who have read anything about him would consider the former even remotely acceptable. Which leaves us with the conclusion that the Rebbe did not want an heir.

He devoted the last 40 years of his life to the radical transformation of Lubavitch from just another chassidic "sect" into a vast army on a permanent mission of spreading both halachic and kabbalistic Judaism around the globe.

Within that "militaristic" view of the Rebbe, the large enclaves of Lubavitch communities are necessary only as sources for new recruits. Or, as one senior Lubavitcher once told me: "Crown Heights is made up only of people who are potential shlichim (emissaries) or have failed to become shlichim."

It appears that the Rebbe sought to dismantle the monolithic Lubavitch Court best symbolized by his own charismatic personality. In its place he erected some 1,600 new courts, lean, unpretentious and extremely effective at promoting the Lubavitch ideals inside whatever community they may serve.

The founder of Chassidism, the Baal Shem Tov, did not leave a successor. But within 50 years after his death, eastern and central Europe were strewn with chassidic courts, each teaching its own brand of the Baal Shem Tov's Torah.

That model will be repeated now, enacted in the most selfless manner by a great teacher.

Yori Yanover is co-author, with Nadav Ish-Shalom, of Dancing and Crying, an account of the intrigues within Lubavitch during the last two years of the Rebbe's illness.

Toronto must reach out to singles community

I am a young, single Jewish person living in Toronto, and can tell you why people like myself risk assimilating.

Recently, I have read a number of articles in The CJN about how the community is concerned with assimilation, but they mean nothing. The Toronto Jewish community is expert at creating "impressions," but that's all.

Let me tell you about the empathy and welcome that this community really gives. When I first moved to Toronto nearly seven years ago, I got in touch with Shalom Toronto, who took several months to respond to my phone call. When they finally did, it was a week before the High Holy Days, and I was told nobody would be available to see me until after that time. You might wonder what I did for those holidays by myself!

Then, when someone finally met me, she was a female of a similar age, who spent 20 minutes telling me about her boyfriend problems, dumped me with a small basket of leaflets, and had no suggestions for where I might meet people of a similar age or with like interests.

A week later, I found out by chance about a new youth committee being formed by one of the larger community organizations. I went to the meeting courageously, not knowing anyone there. Unfortunately, my courage did not last for long. I left early feeling somewhat uncomfortable: the individual who had met me from Shalom Toronto was one of the organizers of this meeting! Why, I thought, do people have so much difficulty sharing here?

In seeking to "belong" in the community, I wanted to join a synagogue. Naturally, the larger synagogues were out, not having any family members here to give me an "in" or the means to pay the high incumbent fees. Therefore, I settled on a new, smaller one, that was just starting out. After three years of being very giving with my time, energy and resources, I started to feel very uncomfortable. So long as I gave of myself, people called; when, through illness, I was unable to give, I was forgotten. Also, being a single person, the lack of sensitivity to the status of individuals like myself was quite disconcerting.

Recently, in Boston, I had the opportunity to attend a Friday night service at one of the larger synagogues. The rabbi there was not only informed, but also proactive. He gave statistics about the state of the Jewish community in North America. According to his figures, only about 20 per cent of it is made up of "conventional" nuclear families. His concern is for the other 80 per cent that are being lost, single people and outsiders. Therefore, his synagogue offers reduced rates and an open door to anyone who needs to connect.

Unfortunately, rabbis I have spoken to one-on-one in Toronto just don't seem to get it. Self-interest seems to drive so many rabbinical appointments here: in general, their personal career aspirations and desire for financial success are no different than those in the regular workplace.

Until two years ago, I had not given up on Jewish organizations in Toronto, and was prominent on the committees of various community organizations. As my motivation started to fade, I pulled out: the more I gave the less I belonged and more empty I felt. Subsequently, over the last two years, my community involvement has dwindled to virtually zero.

This is not a situation I have been happy about, so seeing an advertisement in The CJN several months ago for a seminar on Jewish continuity, I decided to try one more time. It was an interesting seminar, and the small group of people who attended it were genuinely interested in the problem. However, as regards follow-up, what happened? Yet again, any enthusiasm I had mustered up was dampened.

Now 35, I realize that if I wait for a more congenial Jewish environment to emerge here, my "better years" will have passed me by. Already, in contributing many hours in service to this community, where I am still a stranger, I recognize how much personal career development time was sacrificed. If I don't meet a partner who is Jewish, at this point I will know it has not been for lack of putting myself into situations where I thought it might have been possible.

I find that Torontonians, with their fine physical facilities, take a lot for granted. In Europe, where I grew up, people seemed to matter more and no one was ever turned away from a synagogue because they weren't from an "established" local family.

I wish the Toronto Jewish community luck. Change needs to happen now, with action. Promises in flashy news articles are all fine and nice but are not enough! Although I myself may have been relatively persistent over the years, I think of the thousands of others who haven't had the same fighting spirit. Finally, I feel myself slipping into their ranks. Having come from a Jewish community with less than 4,000 people, I recognize that bigger, in the case of Toronto, does not mean better!

The author's name has been witheld at her request, since she would not like to rule out the possibility of becoming active in the Jewish community.

Note to Rabin: Diaspora remains concerned

By RABBI J. BENJAMIN FRIEDBERG

An Open Letter to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin:

I am a Diaspora Jew. Even though I spend much of my time now in Israel, most of my life has been spent in the Diaspora. And because I am a Jew, Diaspora or otherwise, Israel is very dear to me as it is to most Jews — somehow we have a share in the fate of Israel. We are not equal partners of course, but we are partners nevertheless.

Therefore I am puzzled, even concerned, by what your policy for the peace process is, and by what you and your government are doing. I watched the signing of the Oslo Accord in Washington on Sept. 13, 1993, and not long ago I watched the signing in Cairo of the documents for Palestinian self-rule in Gaza and Jericho. Not only did I not have a sense of elation — in fact, prime minister, in neither of these events did you look particularly happy — but I, along with many Jews, am perturbed and we are left with a sense of foreboding.

Now why should we feel foreboding? Surely, you have served the State of Israel, and before its establishment, the Yishuv, all of your adult life, as soldier, chief of staff during the Six Day War, politician and statesman. You were elected by the rank and file Labor party members in the primaries because of deserved popularity. As a brilliant commander and strategist, you certainly know more about security and military matters than I. So why are we concerned, perturbed and enveloped in a sense of foreboding? Is it because Israel got rid of Gaza? Hardly — to that we say Baruch She-P'tarani (blessed is He who has relieved me of this burden). We all wish that the late president Anwar al-Sadat would have agreed to take Gaza back along with the Sinai. Is it because Jews are so attached to Jericho? I doubt it. Jericho was never central to Judaism. And most importantly, the vast majority of Israelis, as well as most Jews everywhere, do not particularly relish the idea of ruling another people.

So why this sense of foreboding? Because, you sir, have crossed every red line which you yourself set and said was essential for the security of the State of Israel. You started the peace process by establishing a basic principle that Israel's security would not be compromised.

Is it any wonder then that many are perturbed by the unfolding of the events which display an erosion, even a virtual breakdown, of your own positions?

What is this foreboding? For some it means the weakening of the state and relying on United States guarantees; for some this is a prescription for war; and for some it is a fear that the State of Israel may even be destroyed. We all hope and pray that none of these happen.

Yet we are concerned because your control of the peace process is marked by a number of features that are disturbing.

The first is a kind of naivete about Chairman Yasser Arafat. With whom are you dealing, prime minister? Surely you know Arafat. And if you didn't, you have been advised by some Arab leaders that he is a liar and one who consistently breaks agreements. We were all witness to Arafat's attempt to break the autonomy agreements in Gaza and Jericho — a spectacle on TV watched by millions. Just recently he called for a jihad for Jerusalem. You know and I know what he meant by that, yet his lame excuse was accepted by your foreign minister. He has broken the Declaration of Principles on 40 occasions and you have said nothing. The most blatant of course is the pledge to alter those passages in the PLO Covenant which call for Israel's destruction. He has not done that and yet you've done nothing. His promise to condemn terrorism is an empty promise. He has called for the release of all Palestinian prisoners including the members of Hamas, who have vowed to continue the terror. You surely do not fight terror by freeing terrorists. The naivete on your part is a rather deliberate and conscious one, for you seem to excuse almost anything Arafat says or does.

The second disturbing feature, prime minister, is the "Credibility Gap" created when your statements one day are contradicted by your actions on another. Many Israelis, it seems, mistrust what you say because it seems that you have contravened your promise many times on matters of life and death. Before the elections you promised never to give up the Golan and here you are ready to do just that. On the day after the signing of the Oslo Accords in Washington, you said on the McNeil-Lehrer News Hour "I will never give any future chief of staff the borders which I had to defend in 1967 (borders which Abba Eban called 'Auschwitz Borders')" — and yet you seem to be doing just that. There are other instances: permitting the reopening of the Declaration of Principles after promising you would not; the promise not to permit the UN in the territories gave way after the massacre by Goldstein in Hebron. I am terribly worried that you have said repeatedly that United Jerusalem will remain the eternal capital of Israel, etc., etc. This leads me to fear that you will agree to have the eastern portion of Jerusalem as the capital of a Palestinian state.

Is it any wonder then that for a significant number of Israeli and Diaspora Jews there is a serious question of credibility of what you say?

In your understandable desire to further the peace process, you have used another disturbing feature. You give new nuances to words in order to calm the misgivings of many Israelis. For instance, your interpretation of the word shalom (peace) suggests a kind of Orwellian Newspeak. To me, peace at the very minimum is a state where people are not being killed. Yet terror attacks continue. Palestinian leaders have said that despite the negotiations, the intifadah will continue until "all 'Occupied Territories' are liberated." Your own experts have said that even after a peace agreement is signed, there will be terror attacks against Israelis for 10 or 15 years. Your response to all of this is "that is the price for peace." I fail to see the logic in that; I fail to see peace in that.

No, prime minister, I do not believe that Israel will be destroyed. We know that you mean to do what is most noble and what is most cherished, namely to bring peace. But what I and many other Jews both in Israel and abroad fear is that your methods, policies and concessions, which have moved far from your original positions, will bring war rather than peace, increased vulnerability rather than strength, more terror than quiet. I fear that Israel will have neither peace nor territories. I do not understand your actions. I and many others would be grateful if you would inform us.

Honoring the righteous

The Holocaust was history's example of evil incarnate but even at the moment when the swastika came within inches of blocking out the sun completely, individual examples of virtue flourished.

Some of the Righteous Gentiles who risked their lives to save Jews have received recognition during their lifetime. The leader of the Dutch underground, John Weidner, who rescued 1,000 Jews and Allied airmen from the clutches of the Nazis, was recognized as a Righteous Gentile by the government of Israel and his name was entered as a hero in the Golden Book of Jerusalem.

A tree bearing his name stands on the Avenue of the Righteous at Yad Vashem. Weidner, moreover, was among those chosen to light candles at the 1993 opening of the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. Weidner's humanitarian deeds were thus honored before his death in California at age 81 last month.

Jan Karsky, still active at 80, has also been the recipient of many honors from Jewish and Israeli institutions. But last month he received a special distinction accorded to no other person in North America. Pursuant to a statute of the Israeli Knesset dating from 1985, Karsky was made an honorary citizen of the State of Israel.

The honorary citizenship, given to those who displayed extraordinary courage to save Jews during the Holocaust, was presented to Karsky by Israeli Ambassador Itamar Rabinovich in Washington last month. Rabinovich said Karsky, who was interviewed extensively about his role as a courier for the Polish underground in Claude Lanzmann's film Shoah, at age 80 could lay claim to gevurah (strength), as stated in the Pirkei Avot.

One Righteous Gentile whose exertions on behalf of Jews during the Holocaust has been recognized, but only posthumously, is King Boris III of Bulgaria. In May Rabbi Haim Asa, a local Sephardi rabbi, was invited to address 2,500 worshippers at California's Crystal Cathedral. He told his audience, which included the king's son, Simeon II, that the Bulgarian king saved 50,000 Jews from certain death in the concentration camps. Rabbi Asa was one of those saved.

The Bulgarian king died in 1943 under suspicious circumstances after refusing to knuckle under to Hitler's demands about Jews. He never received the recognition due to him because the Communist government which assumed power in Bulgaria after World War II did not want a king honored in any way. With communism's demise, King Boris III's role in saving Jews is now becoming known.

Posthumous recognition of historic achievements is not the highest form of honor but it is better than no recognition at all. Jews everywhere salute the virtue and goodness of people like John Weidner, Jan Karsky and King Boris III.

Germany's conscience

Richard von Weizsacker, Germany's sixth president, steps down on June 30 after a decade in office.

The son of a German diplomat who collaborated with the Nazi regime, he retires in the full knowledge that he served his country well.

In all probability, von Weizsacker will best be remembered for a stirring, thought-provoking speech he delivered on May 8, 1985, the 40th anniversary of VE Day. To his everlasting credit, von Weizsacker used the occasion to ruminate on an evil chapter in Germany's relatively recent past, an episode which tarnished, perhaps irretrievably, a great nation.

Dispensing with euphemisms and allusions, von Weizsacker berated his fellow Germans for having tolerated crimes against humanity. As he put it: "Who could remain unsuspecting after the burning of the synagogues, the looting... the deprivation of rights, the never-ending desecrations of human dignity? Whoever had his eyes and ears open, whoever wanted to know, couldn't fail to notice the deportation trains."

Driving home his sobering point, von Weizsacker declared: "There were many ways of not burdening one's conscience, of shunning responsibility, looking away, keeping mum. When the unspeakable truth of the Holocaust then became known at the end of the war, all too many of us claimed that they had not known anything about it or even suspected anything."

Von Weizsacker also distinguished himself by being one of the first public figures in Germany to take a principled stand against neo-Nazi violence. After neo-Nazi hoodlums set fire to the homes of foreign asylum seekers, he not only met with refugees, but expressed his solidarity with them, and thereby set a sterling example of civic responsibility.

Von Weizsacker, too, led the first of what would be many candlelit demonstrations against racism and xenophobia, phenomena that inflicted egregious harm to Germany from 1933 to 1945.

In retrospect, von Weizsacker was Germany's conscience during the 10 years of his presidency. One can only hope that his successor, Roman Herzog, is as sensitive and wise.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

WHY JEWS FOUGHT

At this time in history when the world honors the memory of those who died 50 years ago on the beaches of France to preserve democracy, freedom and human rights it is all the more sad and distressing for the Royal Canadian Legion to take such a retrograde step as banning religious head gear in Legion Canteens.

To suggest that religious diversity and tolerance will not be honored in a Canadian institution is disgusting and unacceptable. Discrimination against those with different beliefs is precisely why Canada fought and defeated Nazi Germany. Ten per cent of the Jewish population of Canada fought and sacrificed itself in World War II to eradicate bigotry and racism not to find that these evil manifestations are alive and thriving in 1994 in Legion Canteens.

PUT LIBRARY ON WHEELS

The most valuable part of the Lipa Green Building, which I find on the whole quite inaccessible, is the Jewish Public Library.

Although nestled beautifully in the nearby trees it does little to promote use by the community at large and I find it difficult to urge students of mine, young and old, to use it.

Perhaps someone could give it some thought perhaps even a drop-off lane, off Bathurst Street.

Perhaps as important or perhaps even more, let's see the Jewish Library on Wheels promoting study and use of this vital community resource. Visit us to the north in our community centres and schools and help us get our kids away from the "Power Rangers" and into the empowerment of books.

THE "PIECE" PROCESS

The announcement on Israel Radio (6.6.94) and the article in the Toronto Star (7.6.94) that, indeed, Yasser Arafat was correct when he claimed in the Johannesburg mosque that the Israeli government had given him written assurances that the PLO could operate freely in Jerusalem, is truly astonishing.

The Israeli and Jewish people have been subjected to constant rhetoric for the past two weeks from Prime Minister Rabin and all his associates that "no such letter exists" and Arafat is a "clown" or a "liar."

One can only wonder as to whether other secret deals concerning our fate have been struck. It is with great sadness that I am forced to concede that the only person who constantly tells the truth and is honest all of the time is Yasser Arafat.

This process is indeed a "piece" process; the Arabs are receiving the land in pieces and our government's morality is in pieces.

ATTACK ON GAYS

Re: Survivors, gays clash in Israel at Yad Vashem — CJN, June 9.

Your article from JTS quotes a bystander at a Yad Vashem memorial where openly gay men and lesbian women were in attendance; as screaming, "My grandfather was killed for refusing to have sexual relations with the camp commandant. You are desecrating this place, you homos."

Was it more a crime for this man's grandfather to be raped by the camp commandant than his grandmother? Is a heterosexual Nazi rapist less a criminal than a bisexual or homosexual one? Is not sexual assault an abomination no matter the sex of the parties?

The bystander quoted hates Nazis and homosexuals; the abomination is the question of the two. Over the centuries justifications for discriminating against Jews have been numerous; unfortunately, Jews have also adopted bigotry and prejudice as seen in this attack on gays.

THE POLLARD CASE

Both the timing and the manner in which President Clinton summarily denied the motion for commutation of Jonathan Pollard's life sentence were a blow to Prime Minister Rabin, to Israel, to the Jewish community worldwide and to the millions of people worldwide who had asked him to look into the matter and to address their serious and well-documented claims that a miscarriage of justice had occurred and that the sentence meted out was unduly harsh and grossly disproportionate.

Mr. Clinton chose not to address any of the serious legal concerns that were raised; he chose not to be an honest broker with Mr. Rabin, whose prestige was on the line, and he chose not to show any respect for the Jewish people erev Pesach. He did not review the matter, as he promised in his election campaign. He completely ignored the growing evidence of the scapegoating of Jonathan Pollard to cover for the treasonous activities of Aldrich Ames; he did not consider at all Bobby Rae Inman's confession that he, himself, had stemmed the legitimate flow of information to Israel in retaliation for Israel's bombing of Iraq's nuclear facilities. Rather, he chose to follow the recommendations of the very same discredited and anti-Semitic intelligence establishment which nine years ago conspired to put Pollard away forever!

In allowing governmental agencies to make a partisan and prejudiced decision for him, President Clinton abdicated his constitutional responsibility to remain above the fray and to evaluate the information honestly and independently.

President Clinton gave a flat "no" to all appeals. Like Pharaoh, he foolishly believes that we will let him get away with that. The insult and the injustice are now a personal matter for each and every individual who ever cried out for justice for Jonathan Pollard. The battle for justice for Jonathan, for Israel and for the Jewish people has major implications for all persons in a democracy.

Schindler's List from another perspective

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

The other day I had occasion to watch a British documentary made a few years ago. Called The Passionate Eye, it won Britain's National Film Award as the best documentary of the year.

The title is meant to describe Oskar Schindler as he really was. We see plenty of photographs and a few film clips of him, but hear no interview to capture his personality. Everything is seen through the eyes of others.

Chief amongst them is his widow, a woman who speaks well, has an expressive face and who tries to explain how her husband came to be the person he turned out to be. She tries her best, but in the end she too fails to fully capture his spirit. We are left with what he did, rather than who he was.

Amongst those who testify to his actions are a half dozen survivors, most of them speaking a very passable or even good English. When, as in Mrs. Schindler's case, the answers given are in another language, subtitles are added to the screen.

The opinions voiced by the survivors in The Passionate Eye are almost unanimous: Schindler turned out to be a very remarkable man indeed. Speaker after speaker reveals how he or she was literally and personally saved by the man; how he was kind and courteous, helpful not only in the large task of preserving his thousand-person workforce, but also in small matters of individual kindness. There is only one dissenting voice: a man saying that whatever Schindler did, he was still a Nazi, part of the German war and government machine and he (the survivor) could not get over that ineradicable fact. Schindler, was after all, tied into a murderous machine.

Rabbi Plaut

But this survivor is the exception. The rest speak with a sense of deep gratitude, even love. When the war was over, Schindler was feted in Israel, where he became the third person to be recognized as a Righteous Gentile. Many of the people whom he had saved had made aliyah, and they primarily were responsible for keeping Schindler afloat in the years to follow for he became a financial failure, trying various enterprises and always losing his shirt. He ended up as a remittance man, sustained by regular contribution from people he had helped during the Nazi days. The ending of Schindler's List — a parade of people depositing flowers on his grave — was based on reality.

The British documentary is amplified by a lot of war clippings — from Hitler to concentration camps and their aftermath. At one moment I thought I recognized Dora/Nordhausen, with which I was acquainted when our Army division conquered it, but it may have been Bergen-Belsen.

The Passionate Eye has no sequential, ongoing story. It is somewhat diffuse, but instructive nonetheless. It does not have the sweeping power of the Spielberg drama; it remains a documentary.

As such it was worth watching and it deserved the prize it received.

As far as Oskar Schindler himself is concerned, he remains enigmatic, ending his life on gifts from those he saved. In the final accounting, of course, the character of the man becomes secondary, for what he achieved is beyond doubt. He mounted a personal campaign to save Jews and it doesn't matter whether it was for their sake or also for his. He saved them, and they walk across the screen to tell their tale.

Transnistria — the forgotten cemetery

By FELICIA CARMELLY

Again and again I meet fellow concentration camp survivors, fellow Jews and gentiles, who have never heard of Transnistria.

Every time this happens I feel a sense of desolation and a renewed pain in the scars all survivors carry with them, regardless of how successful and confident one has become.

When I meet other Transnistria survivors and we talk, they experience a similar feeling of pain at the general lack of awareness of Transnistria.

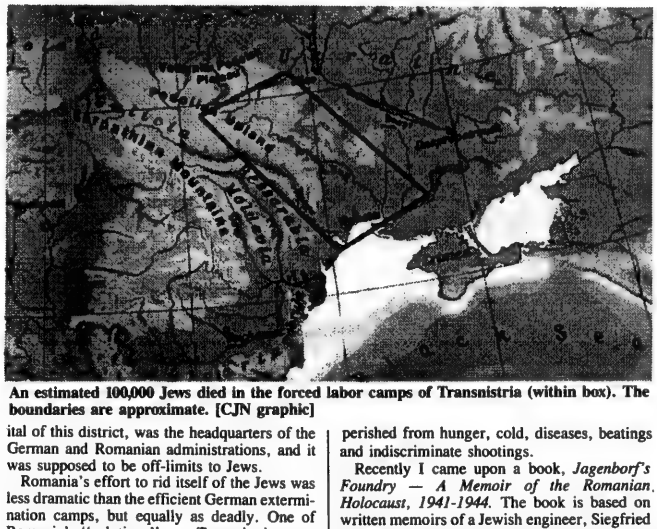
The fact that many Holocaust memorials omit Transnistria only compounds the problem. One exception to such omissions is our Holocaust Memorial in North York's Earl Bales Park.

At times I realize many people do not know about Transnistria simply because little has been written about it, especially in English. There are some writings in Hebrew, Romanian and German, as well as a series of documents and compilations of reproduced documents at the Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

The fact that Transnistria is not a specific geographic name like Auschwitz, Dachau and Treblinka further compounds this lack of awareness.

Transnistria cannot be found on the map. It is a name coined by the Nazis early in World War II to designate the southern part of Ukraine, situated between the river Dniestre (also spelled Dnestr) on the west, the river Bug on the east, the Black Sea in the south and a line beyond Moghilev Podolsky in the north. Transnistria meant "over the Nistru (the Romanian name for the Dniestre)". It was an artificial geographic entity which existed only from 1941 to 1944.

This approximately 16,000-sq. mile territory, controlled by Romania, consisted of numerous little towns and villages, most of which became lagers — concentration, forced labor or death camps. There were about 67 such lagers; here are some of their names: Dzhurin, Tulchan, Bershad, Yampol, Shargorod, Soroko, Sliddiy, Skazinetz, Pechora, Nokolaev, Kopaygorod, Vapniarka and many others. Moghilev, the capital of this district, was the headquarters of the German and Romanian administrations, and it was supposed to be off-limits to Jews.



An estimated 100,000 Jews died in the forced labor camps of Transnistria (within box). The boundaries are approximate. [CJN graphic]

Romania's effort to rid itself of the Jews was less dramatic than the efficient German extermination camps, but equally as deadly. One of Romania's "solutions" was Transnistria.

In 1940, General Ion Antonescu, who demanded King Carol abdicate as he had a Jewish mistress, proclaimed himself "conducator" — the Romanian equivalent of "Führer." He alleged Jews from the districts of Bukovina and Bessarabia favored Bolshevism and were therefore enemies of Romania and spies, deserving to be deported to perish in Transnistria.

Approximately 150,000 Jews were deported. Some 50,000 were still alive when the Soviet troops reconquered this area in March of 1944.

Under the watchful eye of their German bosses, Romanian officials and their Ukrainian collaborators made sure the Transnistria deportees perished from hunger, cold, diseases, beatings and indiscriminate shootings.

Recently I came upon a book, Jagenborf's Foundry — A Memoir of the Romanian Holocaust, 1941-1944. The book is based on written memoirs of a Jewish engineer, Siegfried Jagendorf, a Transnistria deportee. It was edited and contains an introduction and commentaries by Aron Hirt-Manheimer, and copyrighted in 1991 by Ralph D. Stern and Dr. Edith Gitman. The dedication of the book reads: "In memory of the martyrs of Transnistria — the Forgotten Cemetery."

This book provides a historical overview of the political events in Romania shortly before and during World War II as well as some insight into the Romanian approach for "cleansing its soil of Jews." It details unimaginable interventions and manipulations by engineer Jagendorf to maintain a handful of Jewish technical personnel in Moghilev to restore the city's shattered electrical system and repair its iron works. This handful of workers soon grew to hundreds and then thousands of people, who were saved by working in or for the foundry in Moghilev, a city forbidden to Jews. Moreover, engineer Jagendorf and his Jewish Committee managed to organize some institutions simulating those of peaceful times, i.e., a hospital, an orphanage and a home for the aged. At a time and place when all former support systems have vanished, such institutions offered a marginal sense of belonging and community.

The reader of Jagendorf's Foundry gleans an insight into how in the midst of terror, desperation and death, there was a remarkable degree of courage and determination to resist and survive. As a result of the foundry, which became a nucleus for the Moghilev Jews, about 75 per cent of the deportees in this district survived this incredible ordeal. In other districts of Transnistria only 20 or 30 per cent survived.

Doctor Shmuel Ben-Zion of Haifa University states: "With the publication of this excellent work [Jagendorf's Foundry], Transnistria will cease to be 'the forgotten cemetery'."

Elie Wiesel states: "This shattering testimony of cruelty, despair and courage fills a void; not enough is known, not enough has been written about the tragedy and resistance of Jews in Transnistria. Read this extraordinary book with commentary by Aron Hirt-Manheimer and you will not forget it."

As I was reading Jagendorf's Foundry, I recalled long forgotten or suppressed memories of my own childhood in Transnistria. I imagine that other survivors who may read it may react similarly. Such memories need to be recorded, or at least talked about. Therefore, I am suggesting the formation of a support group of survivors and/or children of Transnistria survivors. Interested readers may call me at 482-1813.

Kiddie measurement is truly unique

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

My 4-year-old son picked up one of his sister's socks. He held it up and counted aloud, moving his finger down the length of the sock at half-inch intervals: one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, nine, 11. "See," he pronounced, "you have to be 11 to wear this sock."

I saw no point in explaining the truth of sock-measurement to him. He can barely count. He never has to be anywhere on time. He doesn't have any money: why does he need to know? I'm not against teaching him these things — in fact, I have tried, but I hate to give up relishing his mistakes.

When you ask him how big he is, he stretches out on the floor, arms tight by his side, and proclaims, "I'm this big." And so he is. If you ask him how strong he is, he makes a tight little muscle-arm and adds a ferocious baby lion facial growl to go with it. He'd be just as strong without the growl, but it wouldn't be as much fun.

Maybe it's environmental. My older children also measure and count in funny ways. My two daughters just went off to a two-week sleep-away camp. My oldest, now 11, has been before, but this is the first time away for my middle child, who is almost eight. Because she will be in a small camp which includes her big sister, I am only slightly neurotically worried — as opposed to be obsessively neurotically worried.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

As it happens, a few days before camp, we all went to an orientation session. After that, my middle daughter's previous enthusiasm for the experience waned and seemed in danger of disappearing altogether.

The more we packed and the more preparations we concluded, the more fretful she became. I finally asked her what — other than the separation concerns we had already discussed six or seven hundred times — was wrong. "At the meeting," she said, referring to orientation, "they said we had to carry our own duffel bag into the bunkhouse. I can't pick up my duffel bag. I'm too little."

Well, she is little, and the bag was stuffed, heavy and bulky. I asked if she could drag it, and she could, but it didn't seem like a very elegant solution. Thus, the morning before she left for camp, we took ourselves off to a budget luggage store and purchased a solution: a duffel bag on wheels. She can pull it. In fact, it follows her like a big but obedient dog. She went off to camp happily empowered. I wish all the problems she'll encounter in life could be solved so easily.

When I repeated this story to my mother, she remembered her own heavy suitcase story. She was about the same age as my daughter when she decided she would run away from home. She packed all her essentials in a suitcase and set off into the world. Two hours later, her father arrived home to find her sitting on the stoop of their apartment house, her suitcase beside her, weeping copiously.

"What is wrong," he asked her.

"It is too heavy for me," she cried, as they decided together that maybe she wasn't quite ready to leave home just yet.

I don't know what Mom had in her suitcase. Watching her modern day packing, I'd guess stacks of books and several pairs of shoes, all heavy items. But her grandchildren, my daughters, have inherited her ability to fit far more into a suitcase than the laws of physics seem to allow.

When I helped my oldest pack for camp, the inside of her suitcase became a marvel of precise spatial relationships. The boots were full of socks; the sandals fit snugly into the sneakers; every little corner was jammed tight. But, the catch is that her duffel will never close that way again. I had to sit on it to shut it at home, and I outweigh her by some margin. I'm sure she will never manage to pack it all up again. The bother of fitting the box of Sabbath candles into the box of tissues and then the tissue box into the box of laundry soap is a one-time deal. She'll have to pack her laundry bag as a separate piece of luggage to get home.

But when she and her sister do come home, there's a little boy who will be very glad to see them. Baby brother wanted so much to go to camp with his "thith-ters."

"You can go when you are bigger," I promised him as he pleaded.

"But, Mommy," he said, stretching himself up to his full length, about hip-high. "I bigger now."

The Jewish experience in the U.S.

BY SHELDON KIRSHNER

The acculturization of American Jewry has been chronicled by countless sociologists and historians. Broadly speaking, it is a story of struggle and success, of accommodation and, in some cases, of assimilation.

Judith Goldstein's Crossing Lines (William Morrow, $23 U.S.) chronicles that intriguing process, but with a twist. Instead of surveying the United States at large, she zeroes in on three small Jewish communities in Maine, which tends to be off the beaten track with respect to Jewish studies. A disparate blend of personalities are thrown together here — Protestant patricians and Jewish immigrants; Wall Street financiers and Main Street clothing merchants. It is an effective and engaging methodological approach, providing a reader with sharp insights into the adaptation of Jews to mainstream America.

The focus is on three localities, Bangor, Calais and Mount Desert Island, which, in varying degrees, welcomed the newcomers.

Goldstein, who was raised in Maine, acknowledges that it attracted few Jews. From 1890 to 1910, only 1,800 Jewish immigrants were lured there. During the same period, 66,000 Jews settled in Massachusetts; 108,000 in Pennsylvania; 690,000 in New York.

German Jews were the first to arrive in Bangor, a town dependent on the lumber trade. In the main, they were peddlars and dry-goods merchants. When the local economy turned sour in the late 1850s, they left. A new wave German Jews replaced them in the 1860s and 1870s. They remained in Bangor, but were totally assimilated.

Eastern European Jews, largely from the Baltic states and White Russia, arrived in the 1880s. By dint of hard work, they made the transition from itinerant peddlars to established merchants. They encountered grassroots anti-Semitism, but, as Goldstein points out, they never knew any "violent or sustained anti-Semitism."

By 1915, Bangor had over 300 Jewish families. Native-born Jews straddled two worlds, one emanating from Jewish values, traditions and the Yiddish language; the other derived from the ideas and manners of secular American culture.

Jewish students entering state-side colleges and universities, such as Colby and the University of Maine, met pervasive social discrimination. And while Bangor maintained few residential restrictions in the 1920s and 1930s, there were no positions for Jews in banks, in prominent law firms and on the hospital staff.

The barriers disappeared in the 1960s and 1970s, as Bangor Jews were gradually accepted. The new generation of accomplished professionals and businessmen participated in Bangor's biggest growth industries — the expanded retail shopping centres, the Eastern Maine Medical Centre and the University of Maine in Orono. Sydney Epstein, a son of Bangor, became one of the biggest property developers in Maine.

Jews joined important business and civic organizations, and had no trouble buying homes in summer colonies favored by Bangor's Protestant elite.

But Americanization and acceptance caused a loosening of tradition. Most Jews became increasingly lax about religious observance and kashruth. The informal ban against intermarriage fell. And conversion took its toll. Sylvia Ross, the daughter of William Engel, the only Jewish lumber baron in Bangor's history, joined the Unitarian church, Goldstein notes.

Calais, a town on the border of New Brunswick, was the most tolerant toward Jews. Calais, observes Goldstein, harbored few suspicions about foreigners and no overt signs of anti-Semitism. Unfortunately, Goldstein does not elaborate.

By the 1930s, Calais was home to 15 Jewish families, with the Unobskeys being the most prominent family. They were merchants and they dominated Main Street, the one and only street in Calais that had any retail life.

At its peak in the early 1950s, the community consisted of 26 families. Bar mitzvahs were celebrated, as were all the major holidays, and daily minyans were held. Intermarriage was strongly discouraged.

With its declining Jewish population, Calais' only synagogue, Congregation Chaim Yosef, closed in 1974. And the Unobskey clan moved to Bangor.

But Calais was a good place for Jews. As Goldstein puts it: "Were there other places (in Maine) that had provided such fertile ground for blending tolerance and ambition, uniting the native-born Mainers and the Russian Jewish immigrants? Probably not."

Mount Desert Island, a famous summer resort area, had no organized Jewish community. But it attracted Jewish residents: wealthy Jews who summered there, as well as merchants looking for fresh opportunities.

Joseph Pulitzer, the Hungarian-born newspaper publisher; Walter Damrosch, the conductor and musician; and Jacob Schiff, the financier, all bought homes on Mount Desert Island.

They blended in well, but discrimination was never far from the surface. When, for example, Schiff's son-in-law, Felix Warburg, tried to join an exclusive country club to which his father-in-law had donated tennis courts, he was summarily rejected.

(Hotels and motels throughout the rest of Maine excluded Jews. In a 1946 survey, the B'nai Brith reported that two-thirds of them engaged in discriminatory practices. But these patterns of discrimination went the way of the dodo under the impact of business necessity and legislation.)

Jewish merchants opened stores on Mount Desert Island. However, they did not form a cohesive group, nor were they inclined to establish Jewish institutions.

Traditional Jewish life on Mount Desert Island, which encompassed such towns as Bar Harbor and Seal Harbor, gradually crumbled. Religious holidays were no longer observed, and fewer families insisted on kosher food. Many of the merchants' children moved away after high school, and most of those who stayed married gentiles.

Like Bangor and Calais, Mount Desert Island was inextricably bound up with the Americanization of its Jewish inhabitants. Far though they were from major Jewish centres, these localities were microcosms of the Jewish experience in the United States.

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Later this year, Hafez al-Assad will mark his 24th anniversary as Syria's paramount leader. No one else has ruled Syria for so long or with such an iron grip. But in amassing power, the Syrian president has established a dictatorship which systematically abuses human rights.

With ruthless brute force, Assad has crushed rebellions, arbitrarily jailed opponents without trial, routinely tortured prisoners and suspended civil liberties.

Since the government controls the mass media, newspapers, magazines, television, radio and books are subject to strict censorship. And, of course, freedom of association is drastically circumscribed.

Middle East Watch, the human rights agency, has for years monitored Assad's minority Alawi regime. Its conclusions are contained in a revealing, though not surprising, report, Syria Unmasked (Yale University Press, $16 US).

Primarily, Assad relies on three institutions to perpetuate his rule:

- The Ba'ath party, which has a virtual political monopoly, purveys the official ideology, runs an imposing intelligence network, censors opposing viewpoints and controls trade unions, professional associations and mass organizations.
- The military, to which Assad owes his ascendancy from air force general to president, is the final arbiter of Syrian politics.
- The security apparatus consists of no less than 15 different agencies which watch one another and ensure the loyalty of the populace.

When the prevailing and longstanding state of emergency is also factored into the equation, Assad's power is thus almost limitless. Among other things, he appoints cabinet ministers and dismisses them at will; army generals report directly to him rather than through the chain of command or the minister of defence; and foreign policy is his prerogative.

Assad's dictatorship

In the final analysis, repression is the key to Assad's survival, and the suppression of an Islamic fundamentalist revolt in the city of Hama in 1982 is symptomatic of the lengths to which he will go to crush dissent. Seasoned troops blasted Hama with helicopter-launched bombs and rockets, artillery and tank fire, flattening entire neighborhoods and leaving thousands homeless. Middle East Watch estimates that upwards of 10,000 people were killed.

In a totalitarian state like Syria, disappearances are not uncommon. A disappearance may last for weeks or months, but occasionally, a family is never even informed.

Minorities other than Alawis live under a tight rein. Syria's nearly one million Kurds are particularly oppressed. The regime severely restricts Kurdish cultural and political groups and bans the use of Kurdish in schools and in the media.

The maltreatment of Jews, which reached a nadir in the mid-1960s, is thoroughly documented. "No other community in Syria faces such heavy surveillance and none is made to feel so completely powerless in the face of the authorities," Middle East Watch notes. These lines were written before Assad permitted Jews to emigrate.

Though well-integrated into Syrian society, the Palestinian minority is closely watched. The government has interfered with Palestinian educational, cultural and communal organizations, increased its surveillance of Palestinian neighborhoods and arrested and tortured a large number of Palestinian residents. In general, Syria harasses Palestinians when its policies clash with those of the PLO, which tends to be quite often.

Syrian intellectuals are kept in line through bullying, praise, threats, bribes, fines and social pressures. With few exceptions, young journalists must be Ba'ath party members. A reporter who wants a safe career must abide by guidelines issued by the Ministry of Information. Criticism of Assad, no matter how indirect, is never permitted. Critical references to the military are taboo. No wonder the Syrian press is so predictable and dull.

Apparently, all faculty appointments at universities are screened by the Ba'ath party and the intelligence services. Informers regularly attend lectures.

If Syria reminds you of the former Soviet Union, you're dead on.

A remarkable personality

By CARL ALPERT

If Israel should ever set up a pantheon of the prophets and political pioneers who battled for practical measures to assure establishment of the Jewish state, there will certainly be no lack of candidates for places in the gallery. I wish to place on record for inclusion the name of a remarkable personality, today forgotten by all except a few — William B. Ziff.

Ziff (1898-1953) was known in his day as the publisher of a broad range of technical and popular magazines, chief among them periodicals dealing with various aspects of aviation. He began his prolific career as a cartoonist and commercial artist. He wrote and published poetry, and was a serious painter. During the First World War, he served with the 202nd Aero Squadron of the U.S. army. In 1942, his book, The Coming Battle of Germany, which discussed the organization and strategy of a bombing offensive, became a best seller and established his reputation as an authority on geopolitics and military affairs.

Though born of Jewish parents, he had no sense of identification with the Jewish people, and first set foot in a synagogue late in life. Two personalities awakened in him his sense of Jewish identity: Adolf Hitler and Vladimir Jabotinsky.

He became emotionally involved in the Zionist movement with all the fervor of a convert, and in 1938 penned The Rape of Palestine, a book which turned a pitiless spotlight on the policy of the British Mandatory government in Palestine, which he termed not merely a failure, but a deliberate sabotage of Jewish interests there as well. The voluminous and detailed documentation which he presented made a devastating case against the British colonial bureaucrats, and set the political stage for what eventually became the collapse of the Mandate. Even today, the book breathes a proud, affirmative Zionism and makes stirring reading.

Ziff had more vision than most of the Zionist leaders of his period. At a time when the worst of Hitler's plans for the Jews was hardly suspected, he thundered that "Jewry should seek a mass repatriation (to Palestine) of at least five million people from the ghettos of Europe."

In 1946, already an influential figure in the American publishing industry, he interceded with President Truman against the "blatant anti-Semitic laws" of the Mandatory government in Palestine, and using the Nuremberg trials as precedent, called for indictment of the British authorities for their crimes against the Jews.

This kind of blunt talk did not make him popular with the timid Zionist establishment, and he was more than once accused of rocking the boat. In 1947, as a delegate of the American Zionist Revisionist movement, he addressed the World Zionist Congress at Basle, and demanded immediate establishment of a provisional Jewish government. His address created a storm at the Congress, and steps were taken to expel him. Later he claimed he had turned in his credentials first.

In January 1947, he proclaimed: "I foresee that the Jews will gain control of Palestine in one year." While he welcomed the establishment of the state, he was impatient with what he felt was the political shortsightedness of the leadership, which failed to take bold steps — steps which many today believe would have nipped Arab Palestinian nationalism in the bud.

Because of his lack of confidence in the Zionist political leadership he sought new forums in which to give voice to his ideas. In 1949 he became a member of the aeronautical committee of the American Technion Society, and in that year published in the society's annual a brilliant article entitled Israel and the Air Age. With remarkable foresight, he called for the establishment of an aeronautical industry in the country, and for the teaching of aeronautical sciences in the schools. In an age which is to be dominated by the air, he wrote, no country can survive unless it controls the air.

Events confirmed his vision. Dramatic expansion of the Israel Air Force did follow, as well as the establishment of the Israel aircraft industries, and the opening of a whole department of aeronautical engineering at the Technion. The rest is history.

Ziff is buried at Arlington National Cemetery. Like Moses, he never set foot in the Holy Land, but in his case the choice was his. He was heartbroken at the nature and policies of the first Israeli government, and could not bring himself, at that stage, to visit.

His name should not be forgotten in the annals of the Jewish people.

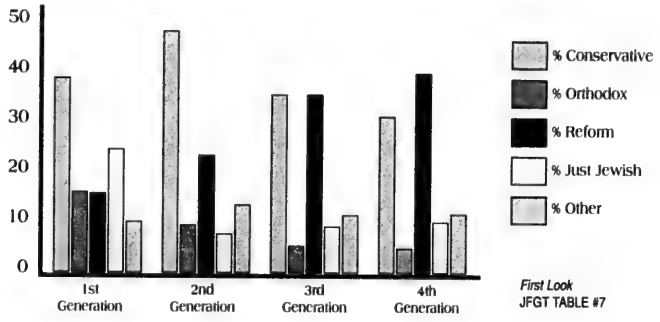
Consider Reform Judaism



Judaism grounded on God's living reality. Judaism where each person is God's partner in the sacred task of repairing an imperfect world. Judaism where men and women are regarded as absolute equals. Judaism where Jews by Choice are welcomed and nurtured. Judaism that sanctifies the individual, yet commands informed and conscientious choices in religious practice.

Arab peace activist has 'vision' for peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mariam Mar'i, Israeli Arab peace activist, described her vision of peace in a recent talk at Temple Sinai: "It means a two-state solution. That is very clear. It means good neighboring, cooperation and inter-relations. It means the Palestinians will be the bridge for peace between Israel and the other Arab countries."

For the vision to become reality, Mar'i said, "hatred, destruction, oppression and occupation" must be replaced by "human rights, equality and education for all."

"We Palestinians have felt all along estranged, alienated, sometimes even unwanted in [Israel]. We consider Israel to be our homeland, yet none of the symbols exemplify us," Mar'i said. "It is very important that a Palestinian state be created to answer to part of our identity that isn't expressed inside Israel."

Mar'i, a Haifa University lecturer and founder of the Acre Arab Women's Association, was a featured speaker along with Daphna Golan, her Jewish counterpart, for Sisters and Strangers: A Jewish Arab Women's Dialogue. Golan, director of Bat Shalom — The Jerusalem Women's Action Centre, had replaced Naomi Chazan, Meretz MK, whose schedule did not permit her to participate in the North American tour.

Bob Rae, premier of Ontario, introduced the evening, which was moderated by Linda Silver Dranoff, lawyer and columnist.

The dialogue, for which Toronto was the only Canadian stop, was sponsored by the New Israel Fund (NIF), a joint Israeli-North American venture established in 1979 to address social and economic issues in Israel.

It's up to adults to create an atmosphere conducive to peace so that their children can benefit, Mar'i said. She recalled that when the late Egyptian president Anwar Sadat visited Israel, the number of Israeli students opting to learn Arabic increased to 80 per cent, indicating "a receptivity for a better life, for seeing things in a much more positive way."

Golan's children are growing up in an integrated Jewish-Arab community. They speak Arabic, and her young son sleeps with a doll he has named after an Arab friend, she said.

"We're trying to make the signature [of the Sept. 13 Declaration of Principles] into a real peace," said Golan.

Golan thanked the NIF for supporting "the courage to fight for good causes even when everybody else thought they were bad ones."

Even within the peace movement, women have been silenced, said Golan. "The mentality is that men know how to do war, so they know how to do peace also."

At the beginning of the intifadah, Golan was active in Yesh Gvul, a group of soldiers who "were willing to defend borders but not to fight civilians in the territories." She was disheartened by the establishment of a Yesh Gvul hotline exclusively for male soldiers.

Because Israel developed as a "frontier society," said Golan, "the dominant culture consists of men who know how to fight wars."

She envisions an Israeli society which is "more democratic, more pluralistic, with equal rights and equal opportunities."

The centre which she directs has joined forces with a Palestinian women's centre in East Jerusalem to form the Jerusalem Link so that, in addition to working with their respective communities, Palestinian and Jewish women can work together for peace and the empowerment of women, she said.

Mar'i said that she hesitated to participate in the speaking tour following the February massacre at the Hebron mosque, but her optimism was restored by the memory of Jewish Israelis who had played an important role in her life.

One, a university professor, vociferously defended her husband's right to receive a grant in 1968. After it was discovered that her husband was an Arab, Mar'i said, there was some question about whether he should receive money that could have been spent on absorption of olim. "I will never accept what was done to us [Jews] being done to others," she recalls the professor saying.

Mar'i takes pride in the role women have played in paving the road towards peace. She noted that Palestinian and Israeli women have participated in peace-oriented activities such as an international meeting in Brussels six years ago since "long before the peace talks began."

"I want my children to grow up without hate," Golan said.

Rabbi Nussbaum was author, Talmudic scholar

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Known internationally for his book Chaplain on the River Kwai, and beloved by his former students in Toronto, Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum, 84, died in Branson Hospital June 15, two hours before he was to be honored by the Toronto Jewish Book Awards Committee. He had been in hospital for two weeks.

Principal of Eitz Chaim Schools for 20 years, he was a Talmudic scholar who wrote not only on biblical themes but about art, philosophy, mathematics and education, in English, Dutch, Hebrew, French, German and Yiddish. His book Chaplain on the River Kwai was written as a result of his days as a prisoner of war of the Japanese in south-east Asia. He had fled to the Dutch East Indies and was with the Dutch forces when taken prisoner. The title of the book derives from his experience as a chaplain with the prisoners building the bridge over the the river Kwai.

Soon after his death, Rabbi Nussbaum's family accepted his award for Semblance and Reality, which won the Penina Rubinoff Memorial Award for Biblical and Rabbinic Scholarship. The book is a series of essays on the theme of Messianism from a biblical perspective.

Hy Bergel, a student of Rabbi Nussbaum 40 years ago, and a member of the Jewish Book Committee, said Rabbi Nussbaum had stretched out a hand to help people make the difficult leap across the chasm which divides childish perceptions of biblical narratives from the infinite depth which in reality informs them.

Bergel said Rabbi Nussbaum cut a dashing figure, always dressed immaculately in finely tailored suits, with trimmed goatee and long flowing hair.

The funeral was held at 3 p.m. at B'nai Torah Synagogue June 16 with the eulogy by Rabbi Raphael Marcus.

Rabbi Nussbaum was born in a small town near Auschwitz in 1909. He received his Rabbinic ordination from the internationally-respected Telshe Yeshiva in Lithuania and did his post-graduate work in mathematical physics at the University of Leiden in Holland.

Among his best known works are his commentaries on the Passover Haggadah and the Song of Songs.

Rabbi Nussbaum was married to his wife, Rachel, for more than 55 years.

Surviving, in addition to his wife, are five daughters, Brenda Jakobovits, wife of Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, Eitz Chaim principal of general studies; Shifra Klein; Nendi Huff, Boston; Chami Schwartz, Detroit; and Ruchani Szendro, Rhode Island; two sons, Motti, Toronto; and Rafael, Brooklyn; 24 grandchildren and 15 great grandchildren.

Couple's generosity aids disadvantaged Israeli kids

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Big givers Motti and Rachel Shlagbaum are motivated by the sparkle of a child's eye.

"When you see the eyes of a child light up when they get something new, that makes the giving more satisfying," says Motti, 42.

Since 1990, Motti and his wife have been sending clothes to the residents of Neve Michael, an Orthodox Zionist school for disadvantaged children in Israel.

The generosity of the Shlagbaums, owners of Slack's Children's Wear, was honored last Sunday by Emunah Women, the organization which runs Neve Michael. Rachel has been a member of Emunah Women for 17 years.

But the clothes for Neve Michael were not sent through Emunah Women. The Shlagbaums contacted the former orphanage, arranged for free cargo space on El Al planes and sifted through mounds of garments all on their own.

Why? "We like to do things quietly," says Rachel, 39.

The first shipment left Toronto in 1990 after the lease expired on Slack's Spadina Avenue location. Before moving to their flagship store at Dufferin and Finch, Motti and Rachel put together 20 boxes of brand-new dresses, underwear, jeans, T-shirts, shorts, tights and Shabbat outfits — $25,000 worth of clothing in all.

"We wanted to start fresh at our new location," Motti explains. "Rachel and I decided, 'Let them [at Neve Michael] enjoy wearing new clothes.' It meant a lot to us."

It also meant a lot to the children of Neve Michael, Rachel says, because up till then they had worn only hand-me-downs. The following year the Shlagbaums sent another 10 boxes of new clothes.

The Shlagbaums saw firsthand how the boys and girls of Neve Michael wore their self-described "Toronto clothes" when they visited the school two years ago with daughter Deena, 15, and sons Aaron, 18, and Yonatan, 10.

The Shlagbaums, in Israel to celebrate Deena's bat mitzvah, spent the day meeting some of the school's 250 residents, many of them children of broken homes or recent immigrants from Ethiopia. The school, founded in 1942, is home to children from 4 years up to 13 for boys and 18 for girls.

Then they invited six of their new friends to Deena's bat mitzvah. "Those six girls made the simchah," says Rachel.

Back in Toronto, the Shlagbaums have continued sending clothes via Israel-bound acquaintances. Rachel says she knows now exactly what is needed — like bigger size boy's pants "because the knees go so quickly" — and packs a duffle bag accordingly. They'll be bringing the bags themselves when they begin visiting their son Aaron at his Israeli yeshivah in the fall.

"We haven't stopped giving now, so why stop in the future?," Motti asks. "If I can do my little bit and know a girl is wearing a new dress for Shabbat, then I'm doing what I can."

Exchange program renewed

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Scholarship flourishes when universities share knowledge, students and teachers. The Hebrew University in Jerusalem has therefore signed formal exchange agreements with universities around the world.

"But when we looked at all of them," said Hanoch Gutfreund, president of Hebrew University, in Ottawa last week, "we saw that they were nothing more than the paper that had been signed."

Gutfreund was in Ottawa to renew one agreement that has worked, a graduate student exchange program between the University of Ottawa and Hebrew University. Gutfreund and Marcel Hamelin, rector of the University of Ottawa, extended the three-year-old program that provides scholarships for one student each year. The two schools take turns choosing an exchange student.

Three students have participated in the program since it was established. The most recent recipient of a $4500 scholarship and air fare to Israel, is Howard Song, a straight A's biochemistry student at the University of Ottawa. He will spend the summer in Jerusalem doing tumor research at the Hadassah-Hebrew University School of Medicine.

The first scholarship student, Karen Totland, a University of Ottawa student who was completing her PhD in chemistry, has since gone on to study at MIT. Last year, Wael Baidossi, an Israeli-Arab and a graduate chemistry student at Hebrew University, spent several months studying at the University of Ottawa.

Working links between scholars cannot be forged by the university administration, said Gutfreund. To build bridges, scholars have to meet each other. That is easier for professors than students, he added, because they make contacts through conferences.

The University of Ottawa is Canada's largest and oldest bilingual university and has about 26,000 students in its undergraduate, graduate and professional programs. Hebrew University, with 22,000 students, educates students from Israel and at least 50 other countries.

Joey Tanenbaum to be honored at Negev Dinner

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joey Tanenbaum, a businessman and patron of the arts, is the honoree at this year's Negev Dinner sponsored by the Jewish National Fund (JNF), to be held Saturday, Nov. 27 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

The announcement was made recently at the annual meeting of JNF of Toronto at the Inn on the Park, where members heard the good tidings that in the past year JNF has spent less and raised $500,000 more than the previous year.

The Negev dinner campaign will be headed by Ronald Appleby and the dinner itself is under the chairmanship of Rob Pritchard, president of the University of Toronto, a good friend of Tanenbaum.

"It will be an unforgettable dinner with that trio," said Pat Alpert, who was named to a third term as president of JNF of Toronto.

Tanenbaum, son of the late Max Tanenbaum, is the complete Jewish community activist, Appleby said, making contributions to its religious, educational and cultural life.

"Without Israel, the Jewish position in North America in 1994 would be no different than in Germany in 1933," said Tanenbaum in a brief response. "As Jews in Canada we must keep Israel strong, build it to a point where no one will destroy it, because without Israel we would not have the life we have here in North America."

At the recent opening of a hydro-electric project in northern Quebec which bears his name, Tanenbaum said he and Rabbi Aaron Grossbaum donned yarmulkes, and Rabbi Grossbaum said the Shehechianu prayer. He said he was proud of the respect shown to them by the largely non-Jewish audience made up of local residents and political representatives of all parties at the local, provincial and federal levels.

The JNF blue boxes will reappear in every home, school and store this year as the Fund launches a major drive to increase the money raised in this manner, reported Ben Prossin, executive director.

Among initiatives for the coming year is a New Leadership Division project headed by Nathan Disenhouse and Stephen Karr, to provide a fire engine to protect one of the oldest JNF forests at Beit Shemesh near Jerusalem.

Among guests at the packed meeting were Avner Regev of Israel, the new executive vice-president of JNF of Canada, and Doron Kadmiel, the Toronto shaliach.

Alpert's annual report was presented in the form of a video made with the help of her husband, Herb, which included some dramatic shots of the flooding which halted the JNF's last tour in Israel for several hours.

A certificate for 36 trees planted in Israel was presented to Esther Gold, principal of Hebrew Studies for United Synagogue Day Schools, on her retirement.

Ziona Hagler, Bialik Hebrew Day School and Ziona Rubinsztejn, United Congregational Schools, were presented with the Esther and Eric Exton Educational Award by Lenny Exton, son of the donors, and outgoing treasurer.

The Bernard M. Bloomfield medal was awarded to Barry Ganz, a dedicated volunteer, and JNF assistant secretary.

A special presentation was made to Ron Jacobson, a volunteer and husband of staff member Lil Jacobson.

It was announced that Alvin Dickstein, the new treasurer, will be national chair of the mega-tour to Israel next year.

Other newcomers named to the executive were Claude Abrams, assistant treasurer; Judith Shostack, honorary counsel; and William Leibach, honorary vice-president. Newcomers named to the Board of Directors were Dr. Voitech Arje and Jack Fryman. Frances Mandell was chair of the nominations committee.

Big enough to be reliable, small enough to care...

Advt.

In fact...

All funeral homes, without exception, charge a basic service fee for facilities, equipment and staff, which includes approximately 60 employee hours for each arrangement.

Our service fee at Benjamin's is $2720, exactly $195 more than the basic fee you would have to pay for a Jewish funeral service elsewhere. Not "thousands" more, not even two hundred more, just 7 percent.

For this 7 percent difference, we offer indisputable benefits. Dignified treatment of the deceased strictly according to Halacha. Personal attention from the most experienced staff, by far. The privacy and comforts of a tasteful environment with superior facilities. The convenience of a unique shiva support. Subsidized bereavement counseling through the Benjamin Institute. And many other intangibles including a commitment to the principles of Kavod Hamet and Tzedakah.

In honouring the departed and coming to terms with a loss, this Kavod, level of service, quality of support and professional aftercare found only at Benjamin's has a value beyond measure.

Certainly beyond $195.*

B.C. Reviews Human Rights Act

VANCOUVER — A review of how complaints filed under the British Columbia Human Rights Act are processed is being urged by Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region (CJC-P).

Responding to a request from the B.C. government to make a submission regarding an overall review of the Human Rights Act, CJC-P says complaints of discriminatory practices which expose a person or group to hatred and contempt "require adequate resources, well-trained staff and streamlined procedures to shorten the length of time to deal with a complaint."

Congress asserts that dealing with complaints of hate propaganda "requires some expertise and specialized knowledge."

CJC-P wants the Human Rights Council to use experts in hate propaganda to train staff and help the public use the Act.

The Congress submission, presented by regional chair Renee Switzer Bellas and legal counsel Herb Silber, also suggests complainants have access to legal counsel and that the unsuccessful respondent pay the cost of public hearings.

It recommends the Human Rights Council assume the financial obligations of legal counsel, or that a foundation in partnership with community-based groups be set up to fund "meritorious litigation" with matching funds from government.

The submission calls for punitive damages as an effective deterrent to hate propaganda and urges the use of interim injunctions while a complaint is being processed. The Human Rights Council should be charged with the responsibility and given the resources for education and information programs to combat discriminatory publications.

The submission also attacks the "insidious and furtive nature" of discriminatory business practices like the Arab boycott of Israel. CJC-P wants the provincial government to enact a Discriminatory Business Act, modelled after similar acts in Manitoba and Ontario.

CJC-P calls for substantial penalties and reduced eligibility for provincial contracts for those who breach the proposed act.

Bronfman Youth Fellowships

MONTREAL — Three high school students from Canada are among 26 North American teenagers named to receive 1994 Bronfman Youth Fellowships, under a program designed to develop future community leaders committed to the concept of Jewish unity.

They are Matthew Friedman at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate in Toronto, Judith Batalion at Bialik High School, Cote St. Luc, and Itia Shmidman at Hebrew Academy High School, Cote St. Luc, Quebec.

This summer, the three will spend five weeks in Israel with the Youth Fellowships program launched eight years ago by Edgar M. Bronfman, chair of the Seagram Company Ltd. and president of the World Jewish Congress.

The 26 Fellows — chosen from nearly 500 applicants — were selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the standard of selection for this fully-funded Fellowship award.

Matthew (Matti) Friedman, son of Ralph Zev and Imogene Friedman of Toronto, is a member of the Hebrew Awareness Club which meets weekly to discuss Jewish issues. Friedman spent last year at Pikesville High School in Baltimore, where he was on the staff of the school literary magazine and founding editor of Rhythm and Ewes, a student run poetry magazine.

Outside of school he has also been an active member of NCSY and served as Torah reader at several synagogues in Toronto and Baltimore. Friedman is also a fifth-year guitar student at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

The 26 Bronfman Fellows for 1994 will fly to Israel on July 6, following an orientation seminar in New York City, and will return to the United States on August 11. They will spend their five weeks in Israel in a program of intensive study, travel and dialogue with members of the educational staff of the Bronfman Fellowship program, as well as with prominent political and literary figures.

After the summer, Fellows take part in organized alumni activities. An on-going internship program for alumni is being formed and will be announced in the coming months.

Planning for Campus

WINNIPEG — It's an exciting time in the Winnipeg Jewish community as preparations are being made for Campus — the combination Jewish high school and community centre to be built in south Winnipeg.

Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's (WJCC) new planning director, is looking forward to playing an active role in it all. "I felt I wanted to use my skills to help the community with the changes ahead," she says.

She was appointed as of May 18, replacing the community's first planning director, Lorraine Bentley, who is moving to Ottawa with her family.

Rosenberg-Cohen brings a masters degree in computer science from the University of Manitoba and almost 13 years of management and systems planning experience at the Great West Life Assurance Co. to her community service.

Senior Peers Graduate

TORONTO — A dozen volunteers aged 55 and over gathered recently for a collective pat on the back to mark their "graduation" from the first-ever Senior Peer Helper Training Program in the Jewish community.

The intensive, 50-hour program, conducted over 10 weeks, trained participants to become "super-volunteers" for fellow senior citizens.

Known for bureaucratic reasons as "Joseph" — Jewish Organization for Senior Peer Helpers — the program aims to provide seniors, both in the home and in institutional care, with an empathetic ear.

Participants — all aged 55 plus — received training in communicating, listening and other so-called life skills.

They will now become volunteers at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the Bernard Betel Centre, Senior Care and Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS).

They are also equipped to deal with ex-psychiatric and Alzheimer's patients, and with those receiving palliative care within the community's Jewish hospice program, which provides in-home services to the Jewish terminally ill.

The idea, according to Joan Stevens of JF&CS, is simple: seniors helping seniors.

"They will help seniors make decisions, solve problems or just be a friendly visitor," she told The CJN.

They will also help seniors access Jewish communal services, she added.

The program was sponsored by Senior Care, the Betel Centre, Baycrest and JF&CS, with support from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

It received a $6,000 grant from the federal Health Ministry's New Horizons program.

The 12 graduates were recruited from a group of 170 hopefuls, who in turn graduated from "A Time for Me," a program launched in 1991 for seniors seeking to sharpen their life skills or head in a different direction.

For details on the next training session, tentatively scheduled for next year, call (416) 635-2883, ext. 800. For information on "A Time for Me," dial (416) 638-7800.

Baycrest Women's Auxiliary Gala

TORONTO — More than 600 guests dined and danced the night away at the recent Night of Nights gala presented by Women's Auxiliary (WA) of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The event, which took place in the Grand Ballroom of the Sheraton Centre, was an outstanding success, raising approximately $200,000 for the Centre.

The featured entertainment was An Evening with Milli, a dazzling multi-media fashion show designed and presented by fashion consultant Milli Gould. Milli is well-known locally and throughout North America. She opened her namesake boutique on Main Street West in Hamilton in 1964 and has built a flourishing business in consulting and design, and in marketing wholesale fashion products.

The show displayed an international mix of fashions from Italy, Germany and the United States — from the wearable suits of Annalisa Fero of Milan to dinner dresses from Candice Fraiberger in Paris and creations from designers Badgely Mischka, Jacques Fath, Karen Lawrence, Roger Sakoun and Renzo, to name a few.

Each year, the Women's Auxiliary organizes a special event for members of the community to raise support for Baycrest. This year's proceeds will fund special care programs for the elderly.

Non-profit Housing Society in Vancouver

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver is setting up a non-profit housing society as a major resource for the community for information on and access to housing.

The chair of the housing committee, Karl Taussig, said plans for the society to swing into action are in the final stages.

The society has the following short-term goals, said Taussig: creation of a registry of rental as well as for-purchase apartments in the Oakridge and Kerrisdale areas where most Jewish seniors prefer to live; an education series on topics such as home modification, home security and fire safety, cooperative housing, reverse mortgages and home-care; a housing fair to be held in the fall.

While the society has as a major focus the aging Jewish population of Greater Vancouver, Taussig says he hopes it will serve as a resource for all non-profit housing activities.

Also being organized is the Vancouver Yaffa Housing Society (VYHS) to create housing for Jewish disabled.

Rhythmic gymnasts display talent

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Parents, friends and family got a taste of high level rhythmic gymnastics recently with a special show put on by the young athletes of the Toronto Aspirals Rhythmic Sportive Gymnastics Centre.

Several provincial champions and national-level athletes were among the dozens of young girls who performed at Forest Hill Public School, where they train.

The calibre of athlete at the club has continued to improve over the years, said coach Lauren Randolph.

A former member of Canada's national gymnastics team, Randolph said five club members will participate in the upcoming national championships July 7-10 at Humber College. One of the girls, Rebecca Studin, will compete as an individual at "level five," the second highest category of competition. The others will participate in a group competition when all five girls are on the floor at one time, Randolph said.

Based on their performances at the recent provincial championships held near Ottawa in Kanata, Ont., the club boasts several very talented rhythmic gymnasts.

The girls, aged eight to 15, came away with three first-place finishes.

In Level 1, a beginner's group, 12-year-old Allison Freeman was named provincial champion for those aged 12-14. She was first in the free routine and third in rope.

Yoni Silberman was eighth all around in the novice category for those 11 and under while Tamara Shulman was 12th all around. Yael Latner was 18th while Danielle Traub finished 21st.

In the novice category for those 10 and under, Elysa Kliman finished 15th all around.

In the junior III A group for girls 10 to 12, Amy Schlein was crowned provincial champion all around after finishing first in rope, third in hoop and second in ball.

Rona Rolfman' fifth all-around placement in junior III A was based on a first in ball, a third in rope and a seventh place finish in hoop. Rona's sister, Maian, 13, was injured and could not compete.

Ramona Omidvar was named provincial champion in the senior III B category for those over 14. She swept all three events, finishing first in ball, rope and hoop.

"The girls really improved a lot this year all across the board," Randolph said. Most train a minimum of three days a week while those at level III train four or five times a week.

"We train them for strength, flexibility, endurance and grace," she said. Hand-eye coordination is essential for routines using balls, ropes and hoops.

"The sport also develops self-esteem," Randolph said. "That is what is unique in our approach. We see them as whole human beings, not just robotic athletes."

Most girls come to the sport with some dance or gymnastics experience, she added.

B.C. medical body elects president

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Dr. Mark Schonfeld, a Vancouver general practitioner, has been elected president of the 6,600-member British Columbia Medical Association (BCMA).

At the annual meeting held recently in Victoria, the new BCMA president said doctors aren't to blame when patients have to wait for weeks for surgery. He said government cuts in hospital funding has caused an increase in surgery waiting lists. Patients have to wait, he said, because operating room time has been cut.

Schonfeld said it should be possible to reduce the waiting list. He said men who need radiation therapy for prostate cancer are being sent to Washington state for treatment but he suggested the province's cancer-fighting equipment be used around the clock.

"We could open it up and let people from Bellingham (a Washington border town) and Seattle come for treatment here."

Schonfeld, 47, said doctors have agreed to have their medical fund payments capped and doubted if the government can save any more in the health system.

Shalom Food Project starts breakfast club

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — About 25 children and some of their mothers and other residents of Plaut Manor, a subsidized housing project on Eglinton Avenue West near Keele, broke bread together this month as part of a new breakfast club organized by the Shalom Food Project.

The Shalom Food Project is a non-profit social agency of the Jewish community.

Since many residents of the building are West Indian, the inaugural breakfast menu included fried plantain, achee with fish and other Caribbean dishes. The thrice weekly menu usually features pancakes, cereal and toast.

Many residents of Plaut Manor are low-income single mothers. The breakfast club is for their children to start the day right, at the same time allowing the mothers time for themselves before going to work.

"It provides children with a nutritious, subsidized breakfast that they might otherwise not have, and it allows them to interact with other children, thus contributing to their emotional well-being," said Emil Sher, a Toronto writer involved in the project.

Plaut Manor, a 97-unit apartment building, opened in 1993. The social action committee of Holy Blossom Temple wanted to provide women victimized by domestic violence with safe, decent and affordable housing. The building, named to honour the Temple's senior scholar Rabbi Gunther Plaut, is maintained by the synagogue's Micah Board of Directors in conjunction with a professional property management company.

For Miriam Kalushner, a North York library worker who is president of the Shalom Food Project, the breakfast club is the first of numerous programs she hopes will be "a Jewish response to hunger."

A former volunteer with Food Share, an organization that helps coordinate food banks, Kalushner said she was regularly approached by people needing sustenance. "My frustration was that I could send people to churches but I couldn't send them to synagogues (for food). I really wanted to see a presence by the Jewish community in the anti-hunger movement."

She and others involved in the project didn't want to establish another food bank in Toronto, since those already in existence seemed to have difficulty collecting food. Besides, she says, food banks alleviate hunger but can be demeaning for users. Plaut Manor residents run the breakfast club themselves, she says; Shalom Food Project volunteers are facilitators who attain funding (from Temple Har Zion, Mazon and other sources) as well as contributions of food from nearby supermarkets.

Breakfasts at Plaut Manor are open to all the building's residents, and several senior citizens living there assist the breakfast club.

According to its mission statement, the Shalom Food Project "is committed to encourage people to work cooperatively in programs that encourage socialization, mutual support, respect, and above all access to better nutrition."

Sher said following the start of the Plaut Manor breakfast club, "our first priority is to insure its continued growth. We hope to initiate other self-empowering food programs in the near future, and we're looking for support within the Jewish community."

WUJS program growing strong after 26 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Exciting, successful Jewish country in its mid-40s is looking for a meaningful relationship with bright, young Jewish professionals. No long-term commitment necessary.

The above take on a "personals" ad can be found on the cover of a brochure for the WUJS Institute in Arad, Israel. The Institute, established in 1968 under the auspices of World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS), is now an independent organization offering a unique work-study program for young Jewish adults (21-35 years old) who have a university degree. About half the participants are North American; the rest are from around the world.

Clive Lessem, South African-born WUJS Institute director, spoke to a small group of WUJS alumni and prospective participants, at a recent reception organized by Udi Savion, regional director of Toronto's Israel Aliyah Centre. Israeli atmosphere was provided by violinist Marina Zelter, a University of Toronto student who moved here four years ago from Moscow.

"For those who have made aliyah [about 30 per cent of the 6,000 WUJS alumni], the period of time they stayed at the institute helped ease them into Israeli society," Lessem said. "For those who came back, it was a formative event in their Jewish identity."

WUJS alumna Tanya Mankowitz agrees. Although she had a strong Jewish identity before attending WUJS, she feels the experience reinforced it.

The WUJS program begins with a five and a half-month stay at the institute in Arad, an experience which includes Hebrew ulpan, Jewish and Israel study courses, hiking excursions, and a two-week volunteer period. "Adoption" by a local family can be arranged for interested students.

The second half of the year is spent either working or volunteering.

Clive Lessem

"We assist as much as possible in finding work for a minimum of six months," said Lessem.

Lessem mentioned that in 1991 WUJS instituted a program for artists, who spend six months learning Hebrew and working on their art at the Institute. There are now 30 alumni of the art program, which is funded by the Montreal-based CRB (Charles R. Bronfman) Foundation.

"The Institute is now playing a leading role in the issues of Jewish education and Jewish continuity," Lessem said.

Alan Reitzes, director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, attended WUJS in 1972 and still visits his adoptive Israeli family whenever he is in Israel. He spoke briefly about the role of the Federation in supporting both Israel and the local Jewish community, and encouraged those at the reception to become involved in the community as volunteers.

Lessem noted that WUJS graduates such as Reitzes typically play an active role in their communities.

Rural Manitoba students take trip to Dachau

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspndent

WINNIPEG — A group of 32 rural Manitoba high school students spent their spring break this year on a 10-day tour of Switzerland, Austria and Germany which included a stop at Dachau Concentration Camp near Munich.

"We spend some time studying the Holocaust so most of the students have some background knowledge," said trip organizer and Treherne Collegiate Institute history teacher John Tate.

"They showed a certain reverence, a sense of awe at being in the camp. It is one thing to read and study the documents but to actually be there. . . The students became very quiet as they broke into small groups and wandered around the site."

Treherne is a town of about 600 west of Winnipeg. It is not the kind of place where people have an opportunity to meet many Jews. Tate, who has taught at the high school for 22 years, recalls a visit by the Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate basketball team for an exhibition game a few years ago. He remembers one boy asking another what "they" were like.

"Although most people in town are unfamiliar with Jewish culture, there is no overt anti-Semitism," he said. "We have even gotten kids out of the habit using the word 'Jew' in a pejorative sense. I used to hear a lot of that when I first came here."

Tate's own interest in the Holocaust stems from growing up in Winnipeg's heavily Jewish River Heights area where he had many Jewish friends. The visit to Dachau began with an offhand suggestion he made to his Grade 12 class in 1986.

At the time, he was teaching about the Soviet Union and came across a brochure from a European travel company.

"I mentioned it as a joke to the class," he recalled. "To my surprise, a few students were interested. It was short notice but my wife and I went on the tour with three students. The tours have now become a tradition. Every two years, we take Grade 11 and 12 students on one."

In 1988, they went to England. In 1990, the stop at Dachau first got his eye. Tate was enthusiastic about the prospect and convinced his students. In 1992, he led his students on a tour of western Europe while this year, they returned to Germany and Dachau.

This year's group included students from the towns of Boissevain and Baldur. He intends to go back but "we'll try a, different trip next time," he said.

Ben-Gurion's son to visit

TORONTO — Amos Ben-Gurion, son of Israel's first prime minister, will be the guest speaker at a public lecture August 17 at Temple Sinai.

Ben-Gurion, the former head of Ata Ltd., Israel's largest textile company, will discuss What Is The Unique Mission of Israel. He will also speak in Vancouver.

The 8 p.m. lecture is co-sponsored by the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University and Temple Sinai under the auspices of Temple Sinai's adult education committee.

Born in London, England, Amos Ben-Gurion came to Palestine in 1922.

He graduated from Kadoori College in 1938 and served in the British Army during World War II. He later joined the Haganah and was a battalion commander in the Israel Defence Forces.

After a long career in law enforcement, Ben-Gurion joined Ata in 1963. He retired as chief executive officer in 1980.

Temple Sinai is located at 210 Wilson Ave. For more information, call Claire Horowitz at (416) 665-8054.

Irv Ungerman receives award from shul for aiding charities

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was lucky sevens all around for Irving Ungerman last week, as he was named honoree at the 43rd annual humanitarian award dinner of the Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Held on June 7, with speeches limited to seven minutes and as 43rd recipient (4 plus 3 equals 7), Ungerman's lucky number came up time and again as a glittery array of friends and family paid tribute to the former poultry kingpin.

The first Canadian inducted into the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Israel, Ungerman was lauded for his generosity and tireless efforts on behalf of a variety of charities and sporting enterprises.

"He's always doing things for others," said Toronto Sun publisher Paul Godfrey, who introduced Ungerman. "He's an absolute giver and never a taker."

Ungerman joins a long list of prestigious recipients of the Beth Sholom award. Previous honorees include former Governor-General Jean Sauve, former Supreme Court of Canada (SCC) chief justice Bora Laskin, former Ontario premier Bill Davis, and Dean Maxwell Cohen of McGill University law school.

Ungerman could have been honored 20 or 30 years ago, Godfrey said. He served his country in war and he continues to serve his community "because he cares. He asks for no recognition whatsoever."

Godfrey pointed to Ungerman's support for the city's Santa Claus parade when a major sponsor withdrew and he also recalled how he helped promote Canadian boxers George Chuvalo and Clyde Gray to international stature.

Godfrey also recalled how during a visit to Las Vegas he was asked whether he knew that "chicken-plucker" from Toronto. The questioner was none other than boxing great, Joe Louis.

Ungerman, founder of a major poultry business, even gave him chickens for his bar mitzvah, Godfrey joked.

Television and film actor Al Waxman, Ungerman's cousin, referred to Ungerman's role in helping promote Toronto's vitality, helping make it a world class city. Ungerman inherited his mother Jenny's belief that "you don't just take from a city, you give back," Waxman said.

A host of other well-wishers praised Ungerman's civic service and unstinting support for a variety of charitable causes. Dennis Flynn, Metro Toronto's deputy chair, noted that Ungerman gave generously of his time to aid worthy endeavors in Metro. Kudos were delivered by Toronto Mayor June Rowlands; Etobicoke Mayor Bruce Sinclair; entrepreneur Ed Mirvish, last year's recipient; Maccabi Canada official Art Kraus; Brotherhood president Phil Stein; synagogue president Norman Talsky; Beth Sholom Rabbi Irvin Brandwein; and dinner co-chairs Frank Cadesky and Mendel Green.

Sylvia Ungerman, Irv's wife, was recognized by several speakers, including Beth Sholom Rabbi Emeritus David Monson; Sandra Parl, president of the synagogue's Sisterhood; and by Lincoln Alexander, former Lt.-Gov. of Ontario, who said she "enhanced the community" to which she belongs.

Israel Consul General Dror Zeigerman noted that Ungerman was one of only 200 athletes, coaches and officials inducted into the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame at the Wingate Institute in Israel.

Sports has been a major part of Ungerman's community involvement. In addition to being one of Canada's major boxing promoters, Ungerman has served as national fund raising chair of Maccabi Canada for 25 years, accompanying the team many times to Israel for the quadrennial games.

The honoree referred to the Maccabi organization in his address, which he stretched from seven to 11 minutes, his other lucky number.

Maccabi Canada combines his love of sports with his support for developing young people to serve as the backbone of society, he said.

Typically for someone who is a supporter of many charities, he encouraged the 625 dinner guests to get involved in community endeavors.

Ungerman's own CV reflects his varied community involvements. He is on the board of the Mount Sinai Hospital, the Beth Sholom Synagogue and the Shaare Zedec Hospital in Israel.

He is a supporter of the Variety Village children's charity, the Salvation Army and St. Albans Boys Club, and is a director of the Santa Claus Parade.

He was the recipient in 1961 of the B'nai Brith Service Award and in 1973 he was the first inductee into the Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame. In 1987 he was given the North York Mayor's Medal as civilian of the year and in 1990 he was the Jewish Community Centre's Sportsman of the Year.

Among the guests present to honor Ungerman were Chuvalo, Gray, and boxer Sean O'Sullivan; Alan Eagleson; former hockey star Paul Henderson; John Bitove Jr.; SCC judge John Sopinka; Toronto Maple Leafs owner Steve Stavro; broadcaster Johnny Esaw; Robert Hall, international counsellor for Variety Clubs International and brother of TV personality Monty Hall; and George Cohon, head of McDonald's Restaurants of Canada.

Family reunited after over 50 years

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Two Toronto brothers were recently reunited with a first cousin who they thought had been massacred along with at least 2,600 other Jews in a Ukrainian town during World War II.

Brothers Saul Stockhamer and Victor Kosher had an emotional reunion with their cousin Lev Kosher at Toronto's international airport in May.

Kosher changed his surname after the war, so he and Stockhamer could enter Canada under a Canadian Jewish Congress orphans' program.

"We were looking for him for more than 40 years," recalled Stockhamer. "We were trying to find out if he survived the war or not. Under the Communist regime we couldn't find any answers."

The Jews of Kamien Koszyrski and a few neighboring towns perished in an August 1942 massacre and were buried in a mass grave. According to a new monument at the site, there were 2,600 Jewish victims, but Stockhamer believes there were closer to 5,000.

The dead include Kosher and Stockhamer's parents and their two brothers.

Stockhamer, then 16, Kosher, 19, and their sister Mona 22, took refuge in the forest until 1944. They slept out in the open and survived by begging for food.

Their cousin Lev, 17, escaped to Russia by horse and wagon with his father. Lev assumed all his cousins perished. "He didn't know about us until three years ago," said Stockhamer.

For the past seven years, on the anniversary of the masacre in Kamien Koszyrski, Lev has visited the mass grave, where his mother and his two sisters are buried.

Three years ago, Lev stood there watching a group of Israelis, survivors of the massacre, laying the new monument. It acknowledges the Jewish victims in Hebrew and Ukrainian. The previous monument had stated that those buried there were killed by fascists.

Lev fought to have the Jewish victims recognized, and he originally contacted the Israelis about the need for a new monument, although he had no idea when they would arrive to lay it.

The Israelis spoke to Lev, and when they discovered his identity, they told him he had two cousins in Toronto.

On his return to Israel, Abraham Biber, one of the Israelis, wrote Stockhamer with the news of his long-lost cousin and included a home telephone number. When Stockhamer phoned Lev in Enakeevo, Ukraine, Lev's first response was to burst into tears of joy and disbelief.

After corresponding with Lev, Stockhamer and Kosher decided "the best thing is to get him to Canada" for a visit.

At the airport Lev, who speaks no English, announced that he wanted to talk to his cousins in Yiddish, a language he had not spoken since he was a teenager. "They've been speaking Russian and throwing in a bit of Yiddish," according to Jordana Stockhamer, Saul's daughter-in-law.

She said that her father-in-law has been taking Lev up and down Bathurst Street "to show him [that] Jews have a life here."

Stockhamer has a photograph of Lev's mother and two sisters, which Lev saw for the first time.

Until he returns to Ukraine at the end of June, Lev is spending his days hanging out at Stockhamer's furniture store in Kensington. "We've been talking about the past, how he survived the war, what kind of work he did, [and] as an orphan how he suffered," said Stockhamer.

He was placed in an orphanage after he and his father escaped to Russia. His father was forced into the Russian army and eventually died fighting the Nazis. Now retired, Lev worked in coal mines.

Lev suppressed his Jewish identity all his life, Jordana said. At home he avoids telling strangers he is Jewish, she noted, but recently in Toronto he proudly told a Ukrainian-speaking street vendor that he is a Jew.

Lev hopes to immigrate to Israel in the future.

Inn's 'golden days' focus of film

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Freddy Sharf was a waiter at Monteith Inn in the 1940s, one of the ways to win extra tips was to cadge extra desserts for his guests.

"Jenny Shopsowitz, who ran the Inn with her husband Harry, was a short woman so I would carry the tray up so high she couldn't see it," recalls Sharf in the delightful 1989 film My Grandparents Had a Hotel by Karen Shopsowitz.

The Monteith Inn, a 150-room hotel, purchased in 1935 for $125,000 by Harry Shopsowitz, burnt to the ground in 1949. No sign of the hotel remains. At the start, the rate for guests was $14 a week (three meals per day) and it went up to a top rate of $42 a week in 1948.

The happy memories of those Muskoka summer days on Lake Rosseau were recalled at the Toronto Jewish Film Society's screening of the film recently at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Shopsowitz has combined footage taken by her father, the late Izzy Shopsowitz, when he worked there as a young man, with recent interviews with guests and waiters, to provide 26 minutes of pure nostalgia.

Izzy Rotterman tells the story of the way the staff hoaxed a naive guest each week into believing that a romantic interlude awaited him in an old house nearby. When the guest arrived at the house, it was the signal for the staff to raise a din by throwing old light bulbs against the house. Unfortunately, one guest got so scared he ran away, fell into a ditch, and broke his leg.

Charles Orenstein recalled how he met his wife at Monteith Inn. Waiters Al Bassian, Abe Bernstein, Sid Jacobs, Jimmy Burstein and Sam Siegelman and social directors Benson Orenstein and Al Goodman described the shows they put together with the amazing talent they found among the guests. Karen's father captured some of those turns on film.

"The difference between Monteith Inn and the Catskills is that at Monteith people considered themselves part of the family, not guests, it was like coming home, and they made their own fun, not depending on paid entertainers," Shopsowitz said.

"Why wasn't Monteith Inn rebuilt?" an audience member asked. "By 1949, people were more sophisticated about the kind of vacations they wanted and they were going to the Catskills and Europe," Shopsowitz replied.

Among the warm family scenes in the film are Harry Shopsowitz presenting a necklace to Jenny on her birthday, and Jenny out picking berries which she used to make pies. Harry died in 1945 and his wife in 1949.

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

Divided We Fall by Haynes Johnson, Norton $32.99

Is American society disintegrating? Is President Bill Clinton correct when he asserts that in the nineties it's "make or break" for America? Was the 1992 Los Angeles riot a forerunner of things to come? How many more crumbling cities will explode in racial fury and class violence? Can Americans make the wise — but painful and complex decisions — that will ensure their well-being and survival?

In seeking answers to these and similar questions, Johnson travelled throughout the United States for two years, from Maine to California, talking to ordinary people about the direction of their country. Wherever he went, he found people concerned and angry about the same issues: crime; massive permanent budget deficits; unemployment and underemployment; the declining schools; the decaying industrial base; and the breakdown in civility, shared values and all modes of authority.

Deftly and empathically Johnson encouraged people to tell their truly frightening stories: college graduates and holders of doctorates unable to find any but unskilled employment; students who fear random violence in the classroom; wealthy people living in fortresslike dwellings; and crippling cuts in services such as libraries, schools and policing.

What is different about the present economic recession from earlier periods of malaise, the author found, is the magnitude of the suffering, the withering of confidence in the American dream and the widespread sense of helplessness, and even despair.

For many persons no issue was more immediate than health care. Yet, few persons were aware of some disturbing facts. Today health care amounts to about 13 per cent of the gross domestic product. By the year 2000, the costs will consume 18.1 per cent of the U.S. GDP. By 2010, when the first of the baby boomers reach their retirement age of 65, the estimated percentage is 22 per cent. By 2020 it's expected to hit 26.5 per cent. Obviously, these astronomical costs are a worrisome deterrent to any quick or simple approach to universal health care.

To an extent rarely understood, American society is being transformed by a huge wave of immigration. "The decade of the Eighties saw the single largest flow of immigration in U.S. history — some nine million who entered legally and at least two million illegally. The number of illegal aliens in the United States is impossible to determine, but some demographic studies estimate it to be as high as eight million — and rising." Religious and visible minorities who have battled long and hard for racial and economic equality now find themselves facing new competition from these newcomers of other races and ethnicities, leading to widespread anxiety and tension.

What do Americands want? Johnson discovered that they are desperate to restore a sense of purpose and value to their lives. They are distressed by how distant and unresponsive the political system has become to their essential needs. It sometimes seems that the forces that are dividing Americans are stronger than those that serve to unite them. Loyalty to corporations has diminished and unions have fallen out of favor among their own members and the general public. Colleges and universities, courts of law, influential legal firms and Wall Street investment houses are no longer held in high public esteem. "Now it's not so much national identity that unites and defines Americans, but identity within ones gender, ethnic and racial group — identity as women, blacks, Asians, Native Americans, Latinos and gays."

Despite the depressing nature of his findings, Johnson is optimistic that Americans who have overcome past crises will successfully rouse themselves from the present "sleeping sickness of the soul." He is sure that he is not recording the obituary of the American dream, but just an interlude in the reclamation of that dream.

This troubling and provocative study should be of overriding concern to Canadians. After all, how the United States confronts the future is inevitably the story of our destiny as well.

TORONTO — In an article about the Shaarei Shomayim Youth Committee's Young Leadership program (The CJN, June 9), John Gasner was incorrectly referred to as chair of the synagogue's youth committee. Gasner is a past co-chair of the committee.

Present co-chairs are Francine Goldrich, Bonnie Silver and Reuven Spiegel.

EYE ON ARTS

Fleischer Retrospective in Jerusalem: During the 1930s, the Fleischer Studios, a Jewish-owned and operated animation house, was the chief competitor of Walt Disney and the largest and most profitable animation studio in the world. It was owned by producer Max Fleischer and director Dave Fleischer, and many of its animators and creative talents were also Jewish, including voice artists Mae Questel (the voice of Betty Boop) and Anne Rothchild and songwriters Sammy Timberg and Frank Loesser. Consequently, many films produced by the Fleischer studio had Jewish references.

The Fleischers brought to the screen such characters as Popeye, Betty Boop and Superman. Max Fleischer invented many of the processes used in animation, such as Rotoscope, which allows animation to be copied from live-action (as in Disney's Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs) and the Rotograph, which permits the integration of animation and live-action (later used in such films as Who Framed Roger Rabbit?) The Fleischer studio made sound animated films three years before Disney, and made two feature-length animated films more than a decade before Disney came out with Snow White.

Mark Langer, an associate professor in the School for Studies in Art and Culture of Carleton University, Ottawa, is an international authority on the Fleischer Studios. He has programmed Fleischer retrospectives at the Museum of Modern Art in New York and for an international animation festival in Ottawa.

This July marks the 100th anniversary of Dave Fleischer's birth, and Langer has coordinated a retrospective as part of the Jerusalem Film Festival.

New Year's Eve: While the end of December is still six months away, it's not too early for First Night Toronto to begin preparations for its annual New Year's Eve celebration of the arts in downtown Toronto. Last year, some 400 artists and about 50,000 people took part. The organization is seeking proposals from artists and community cultural groups regarding innovative and culturally diverse forms of entertainment. Deadline July 15. Contact Laurel Smith-Devlin or Stella Walker at (416) 362-3692 (fax 362-4430). Or drop by 56 The Esplanade, Suite 306, Toronto.

Chautauqua Institution: An astonishing array of events is set to unfold in the delightful town of Chautauqua in upper New York state, about 90 minutes southwest of Buffalo, below Lake Erie. Chautauqua's eclectic, nine-week festival runs June 26 to August 27, and features many performances daily of music, humor, theatre, opera. As well, intellectuals present lectures on such themes as religious fanaticism, the vitality of the written word, race and ethnicity, American humor and the Middle East. Entertainers include Judy Collins, George Benson, Tony Bennett, Art Garfunkel, the Tommy Dorsey Orchestra and the Klezmer Conservatory Band. Authors include Michael Ondaatje, Garrison Keillor and Susan Cheever. For a detailed brochure, phone 1-800-836-ARTS or (716) 357-6200.

Male choir offers diverse repertoire

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Johannesburg Jewish Male Choir returned to Toronto recently for the annual Mizrachi Organization of Toronto gala fundraiser.

The choir attracted a large crowd to Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, including many ex-patriot South Africans and relatives of the singers. Mizrachi last presented the singers in 1990.

From a critical point of view, the choir is one of enthusiastic amateurs. The voices of the members, from grandfathers to teenagers and drawn from various synagogues in the Johannesburg area, are not precisely blended, particularly in the tenor section. Only baritone Bob Borowsky had a voice that bespoke his four decades of operatic experience.

Resident cantor Oshy Tugendhaft, a senior law partner by day, produced heartfelt chazzanut with his pure tenor voice that contains an interesting vibrato.

What gives the choir its most attractive quality is its challenging repertoire. Music director and conductor Gus Levy must be commended. The men sang in Hebrew, Yiddish, Italian, Africaans and English in a concert that ran the gamut from complex liturgical music through folk and contemporary songs to Broadway show tunes. The ambitious program was well paced with just enough balance between serious religious music and lighter fare.

Conductor Levy's strong suit is his ability to modulate the choir's sound; if the section balance is at times ragged, the choir still produces interesting nuances between loud and soft, fast and slow, as well as complex harmonic variations, particularly when accompanying Tugendhaft.

The choir is also fortunate to have sensitive accompanist Evelyn Green and able assistant conductor and arranger Ephraim Katz, who led the singers in the less cantorial numbers on the program. Green, called upon to perform monumental shifts of mood and genre on the piano given the choir's far-ranging repertoire, performed with aplomb.

Politics was a subtext in this concert and provided, for this writer, its most keen emotional moments. These choir members are, after all, those who have elected to continue to make their homes in the troubled country.

As a visible display of their confidence in South Africa, the choir brought along the country's flag while several spokespersons made reference to newly-elected president Nelson Mandela. That the choir sang a medley of Africaans folksongs in the Boer language and didn't get hissed off the stage is a testament to the healing process that all South Africans must be undergoing as the new age of democracy dawns.

March participants get special award

The Nachman Sokol Memorial Award for Canadian Jewish History, a new prize, was presented to Professor Gerald Tulchinsky of Queen's University, Kingston, author of Taking Root.

A special prize went to the participants of March of the Living who contributed poetry and prose to For You Who Died I Must Live On, edited by Eli Rubinstein of United Israel Appeal of Canada. Several of the contributors, Robyn Hochglaube, Lyla Miller, Jenny Lass, Eve Pinchefsky and Emma Sevitt, read or sang their pieces.

The evening produced a surprise bonus for Ariella B. Samson, a teacher who wrote a book about her father, Sigmund Bloom, who had been sent to a slave labor camp when she was only a few months old. When she accepted the award, Samson revealed that two members of her father's family whom she had never met introduced themselves to her before the meeting began.

The presentation of the Drs. Andrzej and Karolina Jus Holocaust Literature Award to Samson for A Letter to My Father was made by Joelle Tollinsky, granddaughter of Hannah Schusheim, book committee member. The Jus family, given the "Righteous Gentile" designation, originally won this prize and gave the money back, with their own contribution, so the award would carry on.

Professor Abraham Boyarsky, of Montreal, co-winner of the fiction award for The Number Hall is a specialist in the "mathematics of chaos" and has a patent on a baby respirator, acording to Miriam Berke, who presented the prize. "With 12 children, how does he find time to do all these things?" Berke asked. She described his book as a "Kafka-esque exploration of a survivor's experiences."

The co-winner for fiction was the late Szloma (Shloime) Renglich for In The Heart of Warsaw. Renglich, who died last fall after a struggle with cancer, was also a previous winner of the prize. Three of his children, Henry Renglich, Esther Wolański and Nina Gold, accepted the award.

The Joseph and Faye Tanenbaum Memorial Award for Cultural History went to Ivan Kalmar, professor of anthropology at University of Toronto for The Trotskys, Freuds and Woody Allens.

Others taking part in the program were Chaia Berkowitz, Jewish Community Centre; Dr. Joel Dimitry and Miriam Gelbloom, of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem; Eleanor Getzler, chair, Holocaust Remembrance Committee; Marylyn Light, Beth Tzedec Synagogue; Professor Bernard Katz of the University of Waterloo; and Brenda Freedman, Rhoda Frisch and Bertha Sokol of the Book Committee.

The event was co-sponsored by Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Atkin keeps auction going with his humor

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Comedian Harvey Atkin can quit his day job in TV and trade it for an auctioneer's hammer.

Not only do the bids roll smoothly off his tongue, but his flair for on-the-spot humor make the bids soar, whether for a meal a month at McDonalds or a weekend in a corporate jacuzzi suite. They certainly did at the annual fundraiser for the Leah Posluns Theatre recently.

When the coffee-table book The Ontario Story was up for auction, Atkin cracked: "If you weren't here the last three years, you didn't miss anything."

A camouflage jacket worth $200 brought this comment from Atkin: 'It's great for shopping in densely-populated malls."

The large crowd took his jibes in good humor. "Why didn't you say you were willing to bid $40 at the beginning instead of wasting my time?" he asked. At another point, he said, "What am I bid for this chazerai (junk)?

When a successful bidder asked what kind of a raincoat she had just bought, Atkin said: "It is good for all rain, even mist."

"What a cheapskate!" he thundered at at another hapless bidder who upped the ante by $1.50. "Are there any other big sports here?"

When four passes for Yuk Yuks and two dinners at Yitz's were up for bid in one package, he said: "While two of you have dinner, the other two can watch the car. Have you seen any good cars lately?"

A weekend in North York, tickets for Blue Jay games, a night in St. Jacobs, two airline tickets to Miami, two nights at the Chateau Frontenac in Quebec City and diamond rings were among the items auctioned off by Atkin, Allan Price, Gerry Salsberg and Ben Libman.

The big draw prize, a limousine ride to Niagara-on-the Lake, tickets to Shaw Festival plays, a weekend at Queen's Landing Hotel, and free dinners, worth $800, was won by Vera Gross.

A rousing stage show, Memorable Broadway Moments, presented performers Gerry (Tevye) Salsberg, Allan Price, Jack Duffy, Aviva Hoffman, Cathy Murphy, Raquel Duffy, Viviana Zarrillo and Lawrence Kagan.

The auction committee was headed by Andrea Bricks, chair, and included Schura Vorona, Ben Libman, Shiny Baine, Shelley and Steve Share, Allan Price, Laura Martins and Jacques and Sylvia Altaras.

Ontario offers wide range of parks

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Each Thursday evening in August, provided conditions are right, a unique ritual between man and beast occurs in Ontario's famed Algonquin Park.

A group of spectators gets into cars and drives in a convoy to a prearranged spot along Highway 60, then disembarks. There is an air of hushed expectancy as a park naturalist imitates a wolf howl, then thrilled amazement as one or more genuine wolves howl back from the bush.

The Algonquin wolf howl, which can attract as many as 1,000 observers at a time, is one of the most popular programs of Ontario's 260 provincial parks. Together, these parks cover 6.3 million hectares — more land than the province of Nova Scotia.

The six categories of Ontario's parks — recreation, natural environment, nature reserve, waterway, wilderness and historical — suggest their astonishing diversity. They range from large, famous tracts like Algonquin, Killarney, Lake Superior and Quetico, where visitors confront the Precambrian ruggedness, to smaller, less accessible parks that feature few or no amenities. Dozens of parks are considered so environmentally fragile that the provincial Ministry of Natural Resources declines making their locations public.

Jewels of the provincial park system are many. They include Bon Echo, where an awesome, pink-and-gold massif juts 100 metres out of Lake Mazinaw. Once considered sacred by native Canadians, the rock has been called "Canada's Gibraltar." The rolling, wind-sculpted dunes at Sandbanks, some of which are 25 metres high, comprise the largest freshwater sand dune system in the world.

Also on the northeastern shores of Lake Ontario, Presqu'ile is a boomerang-shaped spit of land of primary importance to migrating birds. At least 310 species pass through each season, as do migrating monarch butterflies which gather here each September before flying south to Mexico.

In large parks like Algonquin, humans may encounter moose, deer, bear, wolf, fox, beaver and other animals in their natural habitat. Ontario's largest park, Polar Bear on Hudson Bay, is home to a well-protected population of the same name.

Traces of aboriginial culture are found in parks such as Petroglyphs, Serpent Mounds and Awenda. Meanwhile, scenery is the main attraction at Kakabeka Falls near Thunder Bay, where the 39-metre cataract of the Kaministiquia River plunges into a rocky valley. By contrast, parks like Wasaga Beach and Bronte Creek provide much-needed recreational space for the densely-populated urban areas of southern Ontario.

Last year marked the 100th anniversary of Algonquin Park and the provincial park system. This year marks the centenary of Rondeau Provincial Park, a genteel natural area along Lake Erie where remnants of the southern, so-called Carolinian zone forests still stand. This year also marks the 50th birthdays of Lake Superior and Sleeping Giant parks, and the wolf-howls, owl-hoots, canoe excursions, historical interpretation and other park interpretative programs. To date, more than 35 million people have participated in these diverse programs.

A campsite with access to showers may run a typical $13.75 per vehicle ($6 for an additional vehicle at the same site). Recorded information on campsite vacancies is available on weekends until the third weekend of June, and then daily until Labour Day, by phoning 1-800-ONTARIO (668-2746) or 314-0998 in Toronto.

Information about provincial parks is also available through the Ministry of Culture, Tourism and Recreation's travel lines: 1-800-668-2746 or 314-0944 in Toronto. Many activities are planned in various provincial parks to coincide with the Canada-wide Parks Day on Saturday July 16.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

June is Tourism Awareness Month in Ontario, and the provincial Ministry of Culture, Tourism and Recreation is encouraging residents to "take a breather" and vacation in their own province. Herewith, a few choice spots to visit in Ontario:

Science North: Set amidst the rugged rocks of the Canadian Shield in Sudbury, this northern cousin of the Ontario Science Centre in Toronto is shaped — hallelujah! — like a snowflake. Science North features multiple hands-on exhibits that relate science to everyday life, emphasizing the northern environment. A 3-D film in a rock cavern theatre takes visitors on a journey through the Precambrian Shield. A bus takes visitors to the nearby Big Nickel Mine, with the huge nickel out front. Open daily.

Niagara Parks Commission: This provincial body has established a greenbelt of exceptional beauty that follows the course of the Niagara River from Historic Old Fort Erie to the charming town ot Niagara-on-the-Lake, home of the Shaw Festival. The centrepiece of the Niagara Parkway is the world's most famous tourist attraction, Niagara Falls. Receive chills galore, not to mention a lot of water in your face, as you ride to the foot of the falls on the famous Maid of the Mist. Then enjoy the carnival atmosphere of Clifton Hill and a multiplicity of tacky museums.

Old Fort William: On Lake Superior at Thunder Bay, the fort preserves the flavor of the original fur trade that operated from 1803 to 1821. The largest reconstructed trading post of its kind in North America, it displays all the essentials of 19th century trading post life in authentic detail. This summer, visitors are entertained by a colorful cast of historical interpreters portraying wild frontier characters.

Royal Botanical Gardens: Situated between the western terminus of Lake Ontario and the Niagara Escarpment, these 2,700 acres of wooded areas, marshlands and an adjacent wildlife sanctuary feature many footpaths for hikers. The Arboretum holds the world's largest lilac collection and the Rose Garden holds two acres of roses. Starting this year, a large freshwater restoration project should bring much of the inner harbor back to life.

Sainte-Marie Among the Hurons: Visitors to this Midland historical park, south of Georgian Bay, go back 355 years to a time when French Jesuits built the first inland mission in Ontario, in the midst of Huron territory. Nearby in Penetanguishene, at Discovery Harbor, a bustling garrison and naval post from the early 19th century has been re-created, complete with sailors and soldiers in authentic garb.

For more information on summer activities and attractions throughout Ontario, call the province's travel information line, 1-800-ONTARIO.

Heritage study trip

European Notes: A department of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem is sponsoring a Jewish heritage study trip to Italy, entitled Jews of Piedmont and Lombardy, Aug. 14 to 24. The itinerary focuses on synagogues, Jewish quarters and other places of historic Jewish interest, and includes visits to Turin and Milan and environs. Although the trip departs from and returns to Israel, participants from outside of Israel may join the group. For further information, contact Jo-Anne Greenblatt at 011-972-2-342-079. Or write to her at the Department of Summer Courses and Special Academic Program, the Rothberg School for Overseas Students, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Mt. Scopus, Jerusalem 91905.

A famous hat and walking stick still hang at the Sigmund Freud Museum, Berggasse 19, Vienna, where the famed founder of psychoanalysis lived for half a century. The study, filled with classical works of art, still maintains the atmosphere in which Freud wrote his most important works. The museum also houses Freud's complete correspondence and a library of some 25,000 works. Daily 9 a.m. to 4 p.m.

An exhibition, The Jews in Portugal, opens this week in Lisbon, Portugal, and continues through September. Also on view in Lisbon is the exhibit, The World of Anne Frank.

El Al Tops Poll: Congratulations to El Al Israel Airlines, which was voted Best Airline for Travel to the Middle East, by some 2,000 readers of Business Traveler International magazine, responding to a poll. El Al was ranked ahead of British Airways, TWA, Lufthansa and Swissair. It is the second time in as many years that the magazine's readers have voted El Al the best carrier to the Middle East.

El Al is the only airline that offers direct service between Canada and Israel, with weekly flights on Monday and Wednesday between Toronto, Montreal and Tel Aviv.

TASE IN SERIOUS TROUBLE

Shares on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) have registered some of their sharpest falls in recent history over the last few weeks. Analysts agree that the great bull market is over now and that there is a major confidence crisis on the market. This photo shows dealers on the TASE selling, selling, selling. Business outsources back-office chores

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Your back-office work can get done quickly, efficiently and well within budget when you leave it up to the people at Your Back Office.

Wilfred Caplan

Founded last summer by partners Harvey Pollock and Wilfred Caplan, Your Back Office (YBO) uses a combination of knowledgeable people and the latest in desktop computer technology to enable its clients, mostly small to medium-sized businesses, to outsource all or part of their requirements for administrative, financial and import/export information, reports and services.

Pollock explains that using licensed software and networked computers, YBO constructs and maintains for each of its clients a data base that enables it to provide such capabilities as sales tax returns and payroll calculations, customs documentation, mandatory statistical data, sales analysis, inventory control and accounting, and management reports.

"All electronically stored data is backed up on tape during processing and, to ensure complete disaster recovery, two copies of all backup tapes are made daily, with one copy stored off premises. After entry to YBO's system, all hard copy is returned or destroyed and archival information is stored on magneto-optical disks," he says.

Pollock adds that using YBO is a budget-conscious way of doing business "because clients do not need skilled people, software or expensive computer equipment to get their back-office work done. We take their information, put it in our system and prepare everything necessary."

Pollock says that a specialty of YBO is servicing foreign businesses who want to set up in Canada but do not want the expense in terms of back-office work. "These people do not want overhead body — they just want sales and support people and so they have three choices when setting up their business. They can farm their work out to separate parties such as accountants and custom brokers; they can try and train computer staff, which is not cost effective; or we can take the package over and in essence run the business for them."

Pollock cites key benefits to YBO clients that include paying only for the information and services purchased; freeing up time and resources; eliminating fixed overhead costs and getting access to the latest technologies and business solutions employed by larger companies, at a fraction of the cost.

Harvey Pollock

He says that YBO, the only business of its kind, has key personnel that collectively have over 120 years of business experience, much of which is in the senior management capacity. "Whether for foreign-domiciled companies moving into Canada or for existing and starting-up Canadian companies, YBO provides the expertise and capabilities to help its clients substantially reduce fixed overhead costs. Companies can then focus on their core competencies and not have to worry about allocation of valuable resources to perform back-office functions."

Larger Profile for Small Business

Israel — The Israeli government has set up a Small Business Authority to assist smaller entrepreneurs in getting started and staying on track.

The new government agency will be establishing a fund for small business development, sponsoring seminars, creating data banks and coordinating the efforts of other small business related departments.

The Small Business Authority's budget for this year is approximately $2.5 million (US).

B.C. Employment News

VICTORIA — From May 1993 to May 1994, 101,000 net new jobs were created in British Columbia, according to Employment Minister Glen Clark.

In a report to the Legislature, Clark said that in the month of May 1994, 30,000 jobs were created in British Columbia — out of the 57,000 net new jobs created in all of Canada.

"The continued growth in employment in virtually all regions of the province demonstrated the vitality of our economy," Clark said. All these 30,000 jobs were full time.

Clark claimed that B.C.'s success in creating jobs is because "we have managed to get our fiscal house in order while establishing priorities in skills training, forest renewal and enhancing the province's infrastructure.

"The best deficit fighter is job creation. While more has to be done, our record on job creation speaks for itself," he said.

Experimental Drug Assures Healthy Future for Teva

ISRAEL — Economic analysts are carefully watching the progress of tests currently underway on a multiple sclerosis drug, developed by Teva Pharmaceutical Industries Ltd.

Known as COP-1, the treatment prevents painful and debilitating MS attacks among sufferers of the disease. Torontonian Perla Arditti was the first person in Canada to take COP-1.

Teva will likely ask the U.S. Food and Drug Administration for its approval by the end of this year.

Teva president Eli Horvitz told the cable business channel, CNBC, that COP-1 could generate $100 million in sales.

The company's majority shareholder is the Canadian-controlled Claridge-Israel Inc., a Bronfman firm.

El Al Speeding Toward Privatization

ISRAEL — By the end of 1994, El Al Israel Airlines should be privately owned, ending an unusual corporate adventure.

The company is still in temporary receivership, dating back to the dark days of the '80s. However, El Al's economic prospects are so healthy the government wants to take advantage of its restored status by speedily privatizing the airline.

The Government Companies Authority expects to meet the year-end target for transferring through the New York and Tel Aviv stock exchanges. Lawyers have been hired to guide everyone through the transition.

El Al's decision to spend $10 million on improving passenger service is a sign of its optimism. Two new 747-400 jumbo jets will be riding the skies by year end. Dinner is going to be served in business class before take off on night flights, and coach passengers will have access to TV.

Revolutionary Radio System for Israeli Drivers

ISRAEL — An Isareli company is testing the ultimate in hi-tech car radio.

Radio Data Systems (RDS), brought to Israel by I.E.S. Electronics Industries, offers interference-free traffic reports; displays station frequency; scans stations by type of programming; maintains signal strength for long trips; and broadcasts a silent army reserve call up.

Millions of European listeners are already using RDS.

TIPS FROM PROS

By JEROME SHORE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Do you want to turn your small business into a brand name? Of course you do!

Brand name companies get to charge more. Their sales don't go down as much during a recession. They have more repeat customers and they don't have to cut their price when the competition is heavy.

But wait. Can a small business actually have a brand name like Coca-Cola, BMW, XEROX and Colgate-Palmolive? The answer is yes. Brand names aren't only for big multi-national companies. They're also for small companies with products and services to sell in a particular market niche.

We all compete with brand names, only sometimes we don't recognize them because they don't have billion dollar TV advertising campaigns. Their customers, in their market niches, know who they are and why they are brand names.

Try to figure out who the brand name companies are that you compete with. Are there some competitors that make you sweat, because all your customers know who they are and constantly threaten to leave you for them? Do you have competitors who charge more and get it, and you can't figure out why? Do you have competitors whose names always seem to appear in your industry press; who the editors always call for a quote? Well, chances are, those are the brand names you compete with.

What does it mean to be a brand name? Why do customers separate companies, services and products into the brand names and the others?

The answer is trust. And marketing trust in your niche is the way to become a brand name. These are the three concepts which are essential to building a brand name: trust, marketing and niche.

What is trust?

From the customer's point of view, trust is safety from vulnerability. When we buy something or take someone into our confidence we take a risk. We're vulnerable to poor performance. When we trust a product, we feel safe. Brand names are trusted.

The way to build trust is to persuade everyone in your market niche that you're both capable and well-intentioned. Either alone is isn't enough. This is where marketing comes in.

Marketing builds trust

Marketing can best be defined as helping other people value your product or service. It is both a science and an art.

Its a science because it works on the scientific principle that persistence wears down opposition. In this case the opposition is the tendency among consumers not to believe yet another promise. They hear and see about 2,500 advertising promises every day.

How do you get your promises believed? How do you separate yourself from the herd so you're not stereotyped along with the 2,500 other marketers?

You must do everything you can to personify customer satisfaction. Your advertising, if you can afford it, must stress the importance of customer satisfaction and it must be sincere. Advertise buyer benefits not features.

It is easier if you sell face to face, especially for retailers. When you see a customer or prospect you must suspend your self-interest and find out how you can help them fulfil their desires and achieve their goals — how you can help them get what they want. If you make it interesting for your customers, because they're the focus of your interest, you'll stand out from the crowd and be seen as special — and your product will be seen as "capable."

The goal, by the way, is not a happy customer. The goal is a happy customer who will think of you as a brand name and refer you to friends, relatives, acquaintances and strangers — in effect become a walking billboard for you. When your customers are out there pitching for you, you're a brand name.

Becoming perceived as well-intentioned is the art of marketing. You have to think of inventive ways to make people like you.

If you're a small company or an individual practitioner, make friends with your customers and get to know their circle. Join their clubs and organizations. Find ways to help them all personally. People buy from friends. Make more friends. Be patient. The sales will come.

Keep in touch in a warm way. Treat your customers as family (family you like). Send them birthday cards and Chanukah cards. Help them like you. If they like you and if your product is capable, they will tell everyone they know. You'll be their brand name.

Don't be misled; none of this is complex or sophisticated. Your brand name competitors are doing it. As it happens, though, few companies make the effort. Those that do become brand names.

What is your niche?

If yours is a small company, you ought to have a small market niche if you want to become a brand name.

You can't be all things to all people. Find a market niche that you can mine deeply and build a big, profitable market share in. Get a large part of a small market, not a small part of many markets.

Concentrate on becoming a hero to your current clients. They're in your niche. Chances are they hang around other people like themselves. If you're doing a good job, your name will spread and your business will grow.

Guide targets foreign firms who do business in Canada

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Americans doing business in Canada are likely to fail if they assume that our marketplace is an extension of the U.S. marketplace, according to the author of a manual on doing business in Canada.

U.S. businesses sometimes put in a 1-800 number, answered by operators with distinct American accents who request zip code numbers when they take orders, said Robert Cohen, the author of How To Successfully Do Business in Canada. Expecting to increase their sales by 10 per cent this way, they are lucky if sales go up by one per cent. Then "they pull out within a year."

We lose any service-related jobs they created, in areas such as marketing, advertising, distribution, custom brokerage and transportation, Cohen pointed out. To make matters worse, disappointed American entrepreneurs spread the word that Canada is a bad place to do business.

It's in our interest for American companies to succeed in Canada, he stressed, because we get to do the service work.

In the manual, "aimed at anyone who wants to do business in Canada and does not have a strong understanding of the Canadian marketplace," Cohen writes of our attitudes, culture and business environment, including the banking system, taxes, the government, the labor market, transportation, realty and marketing.

"Successful promotional material must ensure that details are specifically customized to the Canadian market," he advises. "Pricing is always in Canadian dollars and toll-free numbers are accessible to Canadians and answered by people who speak like Canadians."

Although Cohen says we have much in common with Americans, he makes it clear that we like Canadians content. "If a foreign-based company is doing business in Canada, it should emphasize any Canadian elements it has to offer." His tips on direct marketing include printing in Canada and saying so.

Canadians, he notes, are more conservative than Americans and concerned with the rights of women and visible minorities as well as environmental issues. "Products that are ozone friendly or somehow enable buyers to reduce, reuse and recycle have a tremendous advantage in the Canadian marketplace."

> "No one knows Canada the way a Canadian does."

The demand for How To Successfully Do Business in Canada has been greater than Cohen anticipated. He thought his first print run of 15,000 copies would last a year, but to his surprise they were all distributed to Canadian service companies, government offices and consulates within four weeks. A reprinting of 4,000 copies is in the works. "There really isn't anything else like it," said Cohen, adding that other business publications aimed at foreign companies usually cover single issues like accounting and not much else.

Madellon Lopes, a trade specialist with the U.S. Consulate, said the manual is very well done. "We give it to our U.S. exhibitors who come in for trade shows."

A year ago Cohen founded the Doing Business in Canada Association (DBICA), a non-profit organization that focuses on educating companies about the Canadian marketplace and the advantages of using Canadian service companies and publications. "No one knows Canada the way a Canadian does," he says.

With 80 sponsors from the private sector and government, DBICA provides a free matching service for companies. An American company marketing a perfume, for example, could be matched with Maclean-Hunter, one of DBICA's sponsors, to get information about demographics. For marketing expertise they might be directed to Dun & Bradstreet.

Cohen formed DBICA and published How To Successfully Do Business in Canada because he would like to see more jobs created for Canadians. However, Cohen, the owner of The Cohen Group, a full-service advertising, marketing and public relations company, acknowledges there is some self-interest. "I make no bones about it. It gets us in front of businesses coming into Canada. From my own agency's view, I consider it an important part of my own marketing."

During the past year DBICA got around 1,000 calls — making up approximately one-third of all their enquiries — from people who wanted information about doing business in the United States. Setting up a network is currently under discussion, Cohen said. If the government or one of the major banks agrees to get involved, he will go ahead.

Exploratory talks target free trade

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian and Israeli officials have begun "exploratory talks" concerning a free trade agreement between the two countries, says Benny Noy, trade commissioner of the Israel Economic Mission in Toronto.

The proposal for such an agreement was first tabled in April 1992 at a meeting of the Joint Economic Committee (JEC), committees responsible for bilateral trade negotiations.

At that time, the reaction of the Canadian government was not encouraging. Noy said officials were occupied with the implementation of the Free Trade Agreement (FTA) with the United States and hadn't yet signed the North America Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

"Public opinion, at the time, was against free trade," Noy said, adding that establishing free trade with Israel was not a priority.

Recent talks included Canadian officials from the Ministry of External Trade and the Ministry of Finance. Noy says a list of reasons why such an agreement would not be advantageous were dispelled. Upon studying the proposal closely, he said officials saw many differences between free trade with Israel and the FTA Canada has with the U.S.

When addressing the sensitive issues — the manufacturing of products that were cause for conflict between Canada and the United States — most don't exist with Israel.

For example, Israel does not manufacture automobiles; they import them. In agriculture, Israel is not an exporter of grain nor would it quibble over Canadian hog farming.

Noy also points out that neither country would have to fear the re-location of or takeovers by multinational corporations, and consequently, a free trade agreement would pose no threat to Canadian or Israeli jobs.

As far as industry conflicts are concerned, Noy said one of Israel's largest industries, diamond cutting, is not one with which Canada is involved. This also holds true when examining Israel's medical equipment industry. Noy said most exported pieces are not manufactured in Canada.

Noy said the size of Israel and the population numbers are often misleading. However, considering Israel imported $30 billion in goods last year, a free trade agreement would open many economic opportunities for Canada.

This week The CJN features...Professional Insurance Services

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The insurance business has always been very competitive. And it's getting even tougher now that banks are getting in on the action. But E. James Cooper, president of Professional Insurance Services, doesn't worry about competition from the banks.

He says the banks are too large to offer the personalized service of small to medium size insurance brokers, like Professional Insurance Services. "At the bank clients are just policy numbers." Personalized service is the key to success in the insurance business, says Cooper, who has been at it for 40 years.

He trained in property and casualty insurance in 1954 and became a licensed life insurance broker the same year. In 1962 he amalgamated Cooper Insurance Services with another firm to form Professional Insurance Services. He bought out his two partners when they retired in 1982.

The Royal Insurance Company has appointed Professional Insurance Services as a Professional Associates Council of Excellence broker. Only 30 out of several 100 brokers across Canada have this status, which gives them preferred underwriting and claims assistance.

Professional Insurance Brokers has three divisions: life insurance and estate planning; property and casualty; and employee benefit planning.

The largest division, property and casualty, includes car and house insurance. Cooper says car insurance is the most common type of insurance purchased because it is required by law.

The client relationship usually starts with the purchase of car insurance, and expands as the client's needs change, he says.

For example, clients may purchase their first car insurance policy while living with their parents. When they move out, they may require apartment or house insurance and if they have children, they may want life insurance. And so the client's needs for insurance grow and change.

Cooper says client loyalty is an important factor in the insurance business, but loyalty cannot be taken for granted. "Clients are loyal if they are getting good service at the lowest prices from a guy they like."

When there is a claim, Cooper or one of his agents follows their clients through the process to help negotiate a satisfactory settlement. "We want you to be happy," he says. "We want you to get a replacement for that stolen ring or car."

Cooper thinks life insurance is a necessity for parents of young children. "The bread winner insures himself to protect against the loss of future earnings." He says the market has changed from being predominantly male. With increased numbers in the work force, women are buying more life insurance.

Professional Insurance Service also offers disability insurance, but it is not purchased as often as life insurance, Cooper says. "There's a 20 to one ratio. Everybody knows they're going to die one day, though they don't know when. Nobody believes they'll become disabled."

In addition to life insurance, Professional Insurance Services also offers estate planning. Richard Segal, a certified financial planner with a degree in commerce is in charge of this area.

Cooper says that the insurance industry has been affected by social and economic trends. With the escalation of the crime rate in Toronto there are more claims for break and entry and car thefts, he says. "There were more stolen cars in the last year than in the last 10 years.

The recession has also taken its toll on employee benefit packages which include dental and extended health coverage. During the boom years in the '80s, many companies introduced employee benefit packages, but now they are cutting back on benefits, Cooper says.

He says one of the reasons for these cutbacks is the increase in insurance premiums which have gone up 20 to 30 per cent. He attributes the increase to the insurance companies' loss of revenue from their investments during the recession.

Cooper says established brokers like Professional Insurance Services have been able to weather the recession without much difficulty, but he acknowledges that there are more obstacles in the insurance business than there were 40 years ago.

He says he's lucky he started out when he did. He could put the hours into the business and still have enough time for his family, and his extensive involvement in communal services.

But it's much harder for people starting out, he says. I'm glad I'm at this stage of my career. Times are tougher."

Israeli firm links phones, computers

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The first telephone system that can be hooked up to personal computers has been introduced to Canada by an Israeli telecommunications company.

Up to 20 personal computers may be linked through the Digital KeyBx system to create a network that lets workers share information, said Ron Romano, a communications consultant with the Communications Solutions Group, a Mississauga distributor for Telrad Telecommunications, based in Lod, Israel.

A telecommunications industry magazine named Telrad's KeyBx telephone system, which includes voice mail, product of the year 1992. "Every time they come out with something, you can bet it features the latest/greatest in high tech wizardry. It comes as no surprise, then to find the KeyBx teetering on the cutting edge," wrote product reviewer Rick Luhmann in Teleconnect.

What are the advantages of having computers networked through this telephone system? The supervisor of a customer service department, for example, has access to reports on accounts as soon as calls with service representatives are completed, said Romano.

The telephone system allows the supervisor to distribute the workload/calls evenly, to keep track of the number of outgoing and incoming calls, and to find out how much time agents are spending on the phone.

With automatic caller number identification, available here through Bell Canada, the system will instantly generate information about a caller, saving time for both the company and the caller. "If you have the proper software package," Romano noted, "client history can pop up on the computer."

One could don a headset, put away the telephone, and have all the functions of the phone on a PC, he said. Then, with the account information on screen, the user would press enter to make a call.

Romano pointed out that the cost of telemarketing, for instance, would go down as representatives, no longer required to punch in telephone numbers, could make more calls per hour.

As few as two telephones can make up a KeyBx user system, while the maximum number is 400.

Telrad offers six telephone models, which include features such as call forward, volume control, a paging system, background music, automatic redial, automatic taping system and least cost routing. When someone dials a long distance number, least cost routing automatically directs it to the line that is least expensive, Romano explained.

The phone system's voice mail can take orders when employees are unavailable to answer phones.

Telrad, which began developing telephones for the Israeli Ministry of Communications in 1951, has its European headquarters in Biggleswade, England, and a North American office in Woodbury, New York. There are more than 300 Telrad distributors in North America and Mexico.

Business grad aids Sick Kids with help of welfare recipients

This article appeared in the May 19 issue of The CJN, p. 22.

TORONTO — A Toronto man on welfare recently raised $4,000 for the Hospital for Sick Children.

Stuart Weinstein, 27, spent six weeks asking fellow welfare receipients to sponsor him for the hospital's Miracles in Motion Aerobathon, an all-day aerobics event held April 10. His donation was the third highest.

Standing outside three Toronto-area welfare offices, Weinstein got "down and out types" to donate anywhere from five cents to $1. "You don't have to look hard to find poor people in this city," he said of his strategy.

Weinstein has been on welfare since graduating from the University of Windsor with a master's of business adminstration degree last May.

As the third highest donor, Weinstein was awarded a four-day trip to Las Vegas and athletic equipment. Aerobathon coordinator Hala Bassala assessed their total value at $1,250. Weinstein didn't accept the prizes, instead donating them back to the hospital.

"I want to get myself into a position where I can afford my own trips," he said.

CANADA, ISRAEL, HOLD DEFENCE TALKS

Canada's Minister of National Defence, David Collenette shakes hands with Prime Minister and defence minister Yitzhak Rabin during a recent swing through the Middle East. Israel asked Canada to reconsider its policy of restricting arms sales to countries under threat of war. Collenette reportedly said Ottawa is re-working its arms sales policies. Collenette also marked the 20th anniversary of Canadian participation in the UN peacekeeping force in the Golan Heights and said Canada would take part in a peacekeeping force between Israel and Syria. Federation releases continuity report

Three priorities identified

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What is the price tag for ensuring the survival of the Jewish community?

According to the recently released report of the Task Force on Jewish Continuity, Assimilation & Intermarriage, it's $1.2 million a year — to start.

The report, two years in the making, was presented by Task Force chair Aaron Brotman at the recent annual meeting of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The sum indicated, the report says, is intended to cover staff, administrative costs and grants to a wide variety of programs and projects.

The money, which would be funnelled through a continuity action committee, might come, the report suggests, from endowment funds or from a reallocation of funds previously allocated to either the community generally or the Jewish Agency for Israel.

That this is a sum that must be paid is made clear in the report. The Task Force is blunt: "Jewish continuity is not simply about whether our grandchildren will be Jewish" or whether existing organizations and institutions "will be able to continue to pay [their] bills and deliver [their] services."

The question is, the report asserts, "whether being Jewish will continue to be important to Jews, or whether it will become a peripheral and ultimately meaningless part of their lives."

The Task Force was established in 1992 by the Federation, in response to the growing concern about assimilation and intermarriage, and about Jewish continuity itself in the Diaspora.

This concern is not merely academic. In the United States, statistics show that 52 per cent of Jews who married between 1985 and 1990 married non-Jews. While the Toronto figure of 22 per cent intermarriage since 1981 seems small by comparison, in fact the intermarriage rate prior to 1961 was only two per cent — a tenfold increase in only 20 years.

The report questions whether the lower figures, as well as what it considers "the vibrancy of Jewish identification and participation of its [the Toronto community's] members" and the excellent Jewish educational opportunities here are due to the fact that the Toronto Jewish community is still fairly close to the immigrant experience.

It notes that the third and fourth generation away from immigration statistically is more inclined to show a decrease in ties and commitment to the Jewish community and experience.

The report sets three priorities for dealing with the potential crisis: family life education, programs for young adults and Jewish education.

The latter priority was not dealt with in depth by the task force, since the Board of Jewish Education is conducting a Commission on Jewish Education, which is expected to report shortly.

(In fact, at the annual meeting, Federation president Bernie Ghert indicated that he was taking steps to ensure that that report would indeed appear in the very near future.)

"The Jewish family," the report says, is "the ground in which Jewish identification can flourish — or wither. It is also the ground on which the community is built, and through which it continues."

The report calls for a wide range of programs to foster and improve a healthy and Jewishly aware family.

These programs should cover the entire age range, and include such matters as prenatal, postnatal and parenting groups in both formal and informal settings; opportunities for parents and children (including teenagers) to interact and communicate with each other; and the development of a comprehensive resource centre.

An innovative suggestion is an adopt-a-grandchild/grandparent program, on the model of the big sister and big brother movement; and a mentoring program to encourage interaction between the young, particularly teenagers and young adults, and seniors.

These programs should be in Jewish contexts (the report repeatedly stresses the need for synagogues, for example, to play an increasing role in the struggle for Jewish continuity), and they should focus on linking living Jewishly (not necessarily religiously) to everyday life.

Keeping the programs small enough to promote the development of friendship networks among participants is a recommendation found throughout the report, and is one of its basic suggestions.

Rabin government, IDF cleared in Hebron massacre

Panel finds security lax

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Rabin government and the Israel Defence Force has greeted with a sigh of relief the findings of the official commission of inquiry investigating the Feb. 25 Hebron massacre.

Following six weeks of closely watched hearings, the panel, headed by Supreme Court Chief Justice Meir Shamgar, issued a 350-page report last Sunday, stating that Kiryat Arba settler Dr. Baruch Goldstein had been solely responsible for the slayings of at least 29 Palestinians at the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

Though it found that security had been lax at the tomb on the day of the killings, the five-member panel, which included an Israeli Arab judge, found no negligence on the parts of government officials or senior army officers.

The panel did, however, note that several border guards were not at their posts at the time of the incident. But it did not recommend that proceedings be initiated against the guards on charges of negligence.

Terming the Feb. 25 killings "one of the harshest expressions of the Jewish-Arab conflict," the Shamgar Commission found that Goldstein had planned the massacre alone, concealing his plans even from his wife, Miriam.

The panel rejected testimony that a secret accomplice had helped Goldstein carry out the killings.

But if the commission was reluctant to attach blame to any one person or authority beyond Goldstein, it was adamant that there had been a breakdown of law and order in the territories.

The situation was compounded by a lack of clarity in IDF orders regarding how to react to a situation in which settlers were found firing on Palestinians, according to the report.

Israeli soldiers testifying before the commission had stated that, according to their so-called open-fire orders, they were not to shoot at settlers, regardless of the circumstances.

The commission recommended that the police force in the territories be substantially increased and that the police officers, rather than the IDF, be responsible for maintaining law and order.

The commission also recommended that neither off-duty soldiers nor settlers be allowed to carry arms into the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

The only people allowed to carry weapons will be members of the permanent guard stationed at the site, which is sacred to both Jews and

Former Arafat guard arrested

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TORONTO — Officials with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and Canada's immigration department recently arrested a former bodyguard of Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat for being a threat to Canadian security, a spokesman with the immigration authorities revealed last week.

Wahid Khalil Baroud, 43, was arrested June 6 at his home in Mississauga, where officials presented a rarely used National Security Certificate for his arrest. The certificate is used to detain persons considered a threat to national security until they can be removed from Canada.

The warrant, signed by Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi and Solicitor General Herb Gray, was based on information provided by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, Canada's equivalent of the FBI and CIA. No further details were revealed.

Baroud, an officer in Arafat's mainstream Al Fatah organization, arrived at Toronto's Pearson International Airport from Greece in May 1991 with his wife and three children.

The family, traveling on forged Egyptian passports and claiming to be Israelis, filed for refugee status.

But officials issued a Canada-wide arrest warrant after Baroud missed two immigration hearings.

Baroud was reportedly in charge of coordinating PLO terrorist acts in Libya, Syria, Lebanon and Greece, where he had been stationed for eight years.

Gwartz, Posluns honored by Federation

Continuity report presented

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

A.A. (Bucky) Epstein presents the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit to Judy Gwartz at the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto annual meeting. [Jay Brodbar photo]

TORONTO —The annual meeting of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, held at the Leah Posluns Theatre, was marked by a brief report by president Bernie Ghert; the formal introduction of the Task Force Report on Jewish Continuity, Assimilation and Intermarriage; and awards to a number of Federation volunteers, most notably Judy Gwartz and Wilfred Posluns.

Gwartz received the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit, and Posluns a special distinguished service award.

Ghert said that while his tenure has given him a great sense of achievement, "I get frustrated, because so much needs to be done, and everything seems to take so long.

"The world is changing," he said. "Our values don't change, but we must change our strategies if we are to maintain those values."

Toronto, he said, has one of the largest participation ratios in UJA campaigns in North America. But over 95 per cent of income is from annual contributions, which is not, he said, a stable source.

A financial resource development planning committee has recommended that a permanent committee be established to bring together professional and lay leadership of UJA and the Endowment Fund; that the planning and allocation process be included in long-term fundraising so that funds can be raised for areas of importance to the community; and that a stewardship committee be formed "for prudent investment and for making sure that funds are used properly and to handle seed money."

The federation bylaws, Ghert said, which up to now "have grown like Topsy," are being studied and brought up to date. Currently, he said, they are convoluted, and work to discourage involvement. "We want to make a clear process, so that Federation will be more open."

A highlight of the meeting was the formal presentation of the Task Force on Jewish Continuity, Assimilation and Intermarriage by task force chair Aaron Brotman. [See page 1.]

Brotman said that the two-year project was "by far the most complex task I have ever had. It was also the most satisfying."

The task force, he said, met with over 40 organizations, had a think tank and spoke with the unaffiliated, the young, the religious, the disaffected.

"We listened carefully," he stressed. "We were not judgmental."

He noted that elementary and secondary school education is not stressed in the report, as the board of Jewish Education will shortly be coming out with its own study.

"We must get off our comfortable chairs. We can't just do things like we did before. It just ain't working," Brotman said.

Judy Gwartz, who received the Sadowski award, was the first president of the Jewish Women's Federation, and is retiring chair of the department for human resources development of JFGT.

She has also served as chair of the UJA Women's Campaign and of the recent Anne Frank Exhibit.

The Sadowski Award, noted presenter Bucky Epstein, is "The highest award the community can bestow."

He described Gwartz as an "outstanding woman; a leader by action and example, who brings honor to every Jewish woman."

Gwartz stressed the need for an organized method of developing and encouraging new leadership, to deal with the increasingly sophisticated community.

Volunteer lay leaders, she said, should understand and appreciate the important role of the professional staff, which, she believes, will "foster an increased appreciation between lay and staff workers."

A special distinguished service award was presented to longtime communal leader Wilfred Posluns, a past president of the Federation and of the UJA campaign, who is stepping down after 10 years as chair of the Bequest and Endowment Fund.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut, who presented the award, called Posluns "a role model for all of us. He is modest and self-effacing — a doer instead of a talker."

Leadership development awards were presented to Jill Goldberg Reitman, vice-president of the Jewish Women's Federation social and political action committee and a former chair of UJA's business and professional women's network, and to Les Klein, a former planning committee member and chair of the federation's leadership development program and now chair of the federation social planning and allocations committee.

An innovation at annual meetings was a musical interlude by musicians of the Community Integration Program: Nina Shapilskaya playing piano and singing, Mikl Ziskind on the violin, Igor Ziskind on flute, and Yiddish and Russian songs by Yuri Tzevi.

Shem Tov Awards, also called Distinguished Volunteer Recognition Awards, were presented to Lewis Moses, for his work with the Board of Jewish Education; Elliott Peranson, Senior Care; Jack Schwartz, Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa; Michael Steele, Kehilla Residential Programme; Rabbi Sol Tanenzapf, Jewish Student Federation; and Cyrel Troster, Ontario Jewish Archives.

The proposed slate of officers and members of Federation and its executive committee was elected by acclamation.

Jewish woman heads Ottawa law school

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Sanda Rodgers is not the first woman, nor the first Jew to become dean of a Canadian law school. But when she takes over the dean's chair at the University of Ottawa Faculty of Common Law on July 1, it will be a significant indication of the changes that have taken place for both groups in the country.

As dean, says Rodgers, 47, her job will be to keep the school on the progressive course set by her predecessor, Donald McCrae.

"[My job is] ensuring the continuation of a traditional, classic, broad, professional education, and also ensuring that our commitment to equity issues in the law school is maintained, and trying to do all of that in the context of reduced resources," says the soft-spoken Rodgers.

She believes strongly that the faculty and student body ought to reflect the society the young graduates will serve.

"The faculty has now made a commitment to ensuring that any hiring it does is done to increase the diversity of the faculty [by including people from] those communities that haven't been represented, and the same is true of the student population," she says.

For instance, when Rodgers joined the faculty 10 years ago, she was one of two women teachers at the school. Today, half the faculty of 25 and half the students are women.

A few months ago, the school made headlines when a student complained about its policy of giving some students extra time to write exams. Rodgers says the practice simply accommodates those with quick legal minds who are slowed by disabilities or language constraints.

Another of Rodgers' tasks as dean will be helping students put their education to work. Because of the recession, says Rodgers, 18 per cent of law school graduates, "wonderful students," can't get articling positions. And if they don't article, they can't get called to the bar. Rodgers plans to work with the Law Society to find creative solutions to the job crisis until the economy recovers.

In the meantime, she would like to see the school's practical programs expanded. Students are already involved in a judge-shadowing program and are also placed with organizations under the umbrella of the Regional Coordinating Committee to End Violence Against Women and Children.

"It gives them practical skills and access to the legal community," says Rodgers. "For the community it means access to students and the research and other skills they can bring."

Rodgers' own career reflects a concern for equality and social justice, particularly in the area of women, law and health care. She was a consultant to the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies for which she wrote a paper about the legal autonomy of pregnant women whose behavior might be dangerous to themselves and their babies. She has also been a legal advisor to the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, a member of the Ottawa Civic Hospital ethics committee, a commissioner on the Ontario Law Reform Commission and a consultant to the Krever Inquiry into Canada's blood delivery system.

Although there have been other women deans, Rodgers will be the first at the University of Ottawa. Society has come a long way since Rodgers entered law school at McGill University in the early 1970s as one of three girls in a class of 50. She says it's important for girls to see how far women can go.

At a recent Law Day dinner, Rodgers sat at a table with several high school girls.

"They were pretty impressive young women and I think the more women they see in positions of authority the more it opens their eyes to what's possible."

Three Toronto high school students help search for better flu vaccine

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three Toronto high school students were part of the first Canadian team to search for a better flu vaccine.

Edward Klugerman, Eli Kane and Mickey Mann, students at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, spent close to seven months working at Willowdale's Connaught Laboratories, only the fourth in the world to do such research.

Their supervisor, Prakash Sambhara, said the research may someday be applied towards developing an HIV vaccine.

Klugerman, 18, who came from Lithuania with his family just over four years ago, said the trio went to Connaught Laboratories in the fall to work on a school project that was supposed to be over in January.

"We got so attached to our work, however, that what started off as a project turned into something personal. We just had to keep going until we got results."

He explained that because new forms of the flu virus develop each year, new vaccines must be formulated to combat them.

"The goal is to develop a flu vaccine that can work against all strains of the virus and we worked on the initial steps that can allow Connaught to continue with its research," Klugerman said.

Sambhara said that as a result of the boys' work "we will now be able to identify and perhaps one day manufacture a more effective flu vaccine."

Klugerman worked last summer at Connaught Laboratories as a participant in the Shad Valley Program, a program for Canada's brightest science and mathematics students run by the Canadian Centre for Creative Technology in Waterloo.

Organizations like Connaught sponsor the program, and students spend one month working for their sponsor.

"This work on the flu vaccine has been a fantastic experience," Klugerman said. "It led us to get a grasp of what the real world of science is all about. We now know what real scientists do."

As for Kane, he said "it was the experience of a lifetime. It was supposed to be a simple project and everything escalated beyond our wildest dreams."

The three worked on the experiment hands-on for about seven months, Kane said, "and when we got to the end and it all worked out, it was overwhelming. It was just extraordinary."

Mann said he was honored to be a part of the experiment. "The group helped make a tremendous contribution to science."

Klugerman said his work reinforced his desire to become a professional biologist. He intends to study biology at University of Toronto next year. Also a proficient pianist, he is working on his teaching diploma at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

Mann and Kane each have one more semester of study at Mackenzie. Both plan to study medicine.

Neo-Nazi leader, followers to spend summer in jail

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Wolfgang Droege, leader of the neo-Nazi Heritage Front, was sent to jail last week along with two others for ignoring a court order to shut down a racist telephone hotline.

Droege, 44, received a three-month jail sentence from Madam Justice Danielle Tremblay-Lamer of the Federal Court.

Droege was convicted of contempt of court June 2.

Gary Schipper, 42, the Heritage Front member who wrote and recorded the racist messages, received a two-month jail term.

Kenneth Barker, 32, who set up the Equal Rights For Whites hotline on Droege's orders, was sentenced to one month in jail.

The Heritage Front was fined the maximum $5,000. The maximum jail sentence for contempt of court is one year.

In handing down the sentences, Tremblay-Lamer said the case was "not about free speech but about disobeying a court order ... To allow an individual to flout the law will lead to anarchy and chaos."

Tremblay-Lamer said the lack of previous contempt convictions and Barker's single parent status were mitigating factors in the sentencing.

She did not welcome arguments from Droege's lawyer, George Wootten, to grant an appeal.

"Your comments are not appropriate," Tremblay-Lamer snapped.

Wolfgang Droege

"Court is now adjourned." All three men were led away in handcuffs.

The three will appeal the sentences if legal aid funding comes through, said Barker's lawyer, Valerie Owen.

The contempt of court charge was pursued by the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) after the Heritage Front began playing racist messages over the telephone last fall.

The white supremacist group had been ordered by a judge to stop the messages until a human rights complaint brought earlier by Canadian Jewish Congress and the Native Canadian Centre of Toronto was heard.

CHRC lawyer Eddie Taylor told The CJN the sentences were significant because "it is rare for the Federal Court to impose a prison sentence" for contempt of court.

Taylor said he knows of only five such sentences in the country.

Gerda Friedberg, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said, "The sentence is not important. What is important is that the court recognizes these actions could lead to anarchy."

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights lawyer Mark Sandler said in a press release that BBC "strongly" supports the sentences.

"Prison terms send an important message to hate-motivated criminals that they will not spread hate with impunity," Sandler said.

But Toronto student Jesse Kaufman, one of a dozen Betar youth group members who helped fill the courtroom, said the prison terms were not stiff enough.

"We're happy they will be imprisoned. It's a step in the right direction ... but three months is too lenient," he said.

Droege is also facing charges of violating his bail conditions by addressing a public forum on immigration last week at York University.

Droege was arrested June 20 and jailed overnight before appearing in Ontario Court, provincial division, the next afternoon.

Crown Attorney Scott Kerr told The CJN Droege was released on a $1,500 bond and is to appear again in court this week.

If convicted, Droege could face additional jail time.

Anti-Semitic comments on CIUT

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A volunteer programmer for radio station CIUT, which is affiliated with the University of Toronto, has been placed on probation and is having her broadcasts closely monitored for four weeks following two recent interviews with members of the Nation of Islam.

Denise Burnett, 31, interviewed Khalid Muhammed on April 28 and Eric Mohammed on May 26 for the morning show Caffeine Free. Sol Littman, Canadian representative for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies then wrote a letter to station manager David Ackerman charging the station with providing a platform for Nation of Islam spokesmen "to voice a series of bitter, flagrantly untrue remarks concerning Jews and their relationship to Blacks."

Littman also sent copies of the letter to Robert Prichard, president of the University of Toronto; Rose Wolfe, the university's chancellor; and Keith Spicer, chair of the Canadian Radio-Television & Telecommunications Commission (CRTC).

This marks the third time in the past 16 months that CIUT has become the subject of controversy regarding questionable programming content.

In March 1993 a group of protesters marched on the station following the airing of a show which featured Wolfgang Droege and Gary Shipper of the white supremacist Heritage Front, and George Burdie, head of the Church of the Creator, a like-minded radical group.

In December Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario region filed a CRTC complaint over anti-Semitic comments made by guests on a segment of African Woman and Family.

The complaint was resolved following on-air apologies and a revamped training program for CIUT programmers.

"Our concern is that we see a continuing pattern," said CJC's Steven Shulman recently.

On the May 26 broadcast, Mohammed said, "So-called Jewish people had a prominent role in our subjugation... No one dared to document the hand of the so-called Jewish people in the world. And because they were so arrogant in their subjugation of us and their victimizing of us, they actually documented it themselves and printed it themselves and teach it to their babies as a badge of honor."

After allowing several minutes of uninterrupted monologue, Burnett broke in when Mohammed made reference to "the most wicked and most corrupt slavemasters ever."

"There has to be another way of dealing with it besides calling names, and we know the Jewish community has also suffered the Holocaust...we need to give them that due respect," she said.

"The interviewer's response...was weak in the extreme as she permitted Mohammed to engage in a blistering, hate-ridden filibuster," wrote Littman.

In his response to Littman, program director Dan Hart acknowledged that Mohammed's comments were "defamatory" and said that he (Hart) had gone to the control room during the broadcast to "ensure that...Burnett challenged Mr. Mohammed to prove his claims."

Hart added, "During the pre-interview, Miss Burnett said Mr. Mohammed assured her he would not make statements of the type that have led to past Nation of Islam controversies."

Hart stated that CIUT "remains committed to the principles of broadcasting governing radio in Canada." He said that the station would broadcast a "retraction" twice daily from June 10 to 24.

The retraction states in part that "a recent CIUT show provided discriminatory views with a platform for which CIUT expresses profound regret." Neither the show, its host nor the name of the guest was specified in the statement.

New programmers at the station undergo a four-hour training program to apprise them of CRTC regulations and of their responsibilities as broadcasters, Ackerman told The CJN. Occasionally speakers are brought in to discuss interviewing skills and sometimes programmers are sent for technical training.

In the June 8 broadcast of Caffeine Free, programmer Bruce Cattle chose to devote 30 minutes to written material counteracting statements such as those made by Mohammed on-air.

Finta case to remain closed

TORONTO — The Supreme Court of Canada has refused to reopen the Imre Finta war-crimes case despite requests from Justice Minister Allan Rock and Jewish organizations.

The court decided 4-3 last week not to re-examine its March acquital of Finta, 81, the former captain of the Hungarian gendarmes accused of sending 8,600 Jews to Nazi death camps in 1944.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, along with the federal Justice Ministry and Canadian Jewish Congress, petitioned the court to clarify its ruling, which accepted the defence that Finta was following orders he believed were legal, given the climate of anti-Semitism in Hungary at the time.

B'nai Brith Canada lawyer Marvin Kurz said last week's ruling was "a death knell to criminal prosecutions in Canada."

But Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association vice-chair Sabina Citron said in a press release her group is still concerned the court's refusal to re-examine the case may have "the effect of legalizing persecution, discrimination and genocide as a political expedient."

Feinberg's hopes rest with new clinic

Suffers from leukemia

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Once again, the Jewish community is being asked to open their hearts — and roll up their sleeves — to help a fellow-Jew.

A blood-screening clinic to find a compatible bone marrow donor for Jay Feinberg, a 26-year-old New Jersey man suffering from chronic myelogenous leukemia, a particularly virulent strain of leukemia, will be held July 4, from 1 — 9 p.m. in Room 206 of the Jewish Community Centre, north branch.

Clinics have been held in the last few weeks in Montreal, Ottawa, and Calgary, and more are planned in those cities.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Machzikei Hadas Congregation in Ottawa sent an information packet about Feinberg and the need for people to be tested for the bone marrow registries to all the congregational rabbis in Canada. Response, according to the synagogue, has been excellent.

Over the last few years, other mass screenings have been held for Feinberg, and for Allison Atlas, a young woman from Bethesda, Md. Hundreds turned out at each clinic.

The testing is a simple matter. A sample of blood is taken and tested to see if the blood type is compatible.

There is no charge, in Toronto thanks to Daniel Laboratories, and in the other cities because those clinics are being held under the auspices of the Canadian Red Cross.

If there is a match, marrow for a transplant, which in a healthy person is replaced by the body in seven to 10 days, is removed under general (or sometimes local) anesthetic.

Although there is some discomfort for the donor, it is easily controlled by analgesic (pain-killing) drugs, or, according to several doctors interviewed for the Allison Atlas testings, by the psychological effect of knowing the significance of his or her donation.

If there is no match, the sample is entered into the Canadian and United States bone marrow registries. Although neither Atlas nor, so far, Feinberg, could find a donor, matches have been found for other sufferers from the same disease, including several in Canada.

Rabbi Bulka tells the story of a woman in Ottawa who came to be tested in a previous clinic for Feinberg, but was disappointed to find that she could not help him.

Shortly afterwards, she was called to give a bone marrow donation to a baby. She agreed, and asked to also send a teddy bear to the child. She later saw the teddy bear in the arms of the child of a long-time friend in Toronto.

Doctors feel that the best chance for a match comes from the immediate family of the potential recipient, but neither Feinberg's parents, siblings or extended family are compatible. The next best chance is someone from the same ethnic background; in Feinberg's case, a Jew with an Eastern European background.

While Feinberg has been treated by interferon and now by oral chemotherapy, these do not alter the natural progression of the disease.

Feinberg's mother, Arlene Feinberg, told The CJN that her son has passed the three year, median life span for the disease. There is no permanent remission possible for him, or others with the same ailment, without a bone marrow transplant.

She says that she never gives up hope. "I will continue to work on drives, to help Jay, and others who can benefit from the registries."

She shrugs off compliments about her courage. "I have a mission in life. The fact my son is so courageous and hopeful gives us courage, as do all the patients who have received donations thanks to our drives."

Blood screening clinics, many organized by the Feinberg family or their friends, relatives or supporters, have been held throughout the United States, in Canada, South Africa, Australia and in Israel. None has been successful.

We could not save Allison Atlas. It is not too late for Jay Feinberg or for others who so desperately need bone marrow transplants.

Tel Aviv U honors Mulroney

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — If there was any question about the sincerity of Brian Mulroney's support for Israel or the Canadian Jewish community's gratitude for that friendship, a dinner in the former prime minister's honor held recently at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue should have put all doubt to rest.

"Anyone privileged to serve for an extended period of time as prime minister can no doubt reflect upon decisions made and wish he had done one thing and perhaps not another...

"But I shall never regret any of the statements I made or decisions I took in support of the State of Israel or the Jewish community that has made such a splendid contribution to the life and well-being of Canada," Mulroney declared after being given an honorary Doctor of Philosophy degree from Tel Aviv University (TAU).

The degree was in "special recognition" of his "warm friendship for the Jewish people, his appreciation of the role of the Jewish community in Canada, and his unswerving and courageous support for the State of Israel."

It was conferred by TAU president Yoram Dinstein, following a formal academic procession that included John Sears, academic vice-president of St. Francis Xavier University in Nova Scotia, and Yvon Marcoux, executive vice-president of Laval University (Mulroney's alma maters), among other Quebec university leaders.

Mulroney was in fine form and charmed his audience with a string of jokes before getting down to the serious business of reviewing his record on Israel and Jewish affairs.

Mulroney said his admiration for Israel goes back to the Six Day War. "Seeing Israel — a small and courageous country threatened by seemingly overwhelming forces — fight for its survival inspired profound respect."

He repeated his assertion that Israel showed "immense restraint in the face of intense provocation" during the Gulf War" and that Israel "does not need lectures from third parties on how to handle its security. It has earned the right to make these decisions itself."

He also praised Canadian Jews' contribution to this country "in a way that is extraordinary in the light of [the community's] size."

Mulroney also commented on the current political scene. He noted that few nations in history have shown such respect for democracy and dissent that a party dedicated to breaking up the country is allowed to take its place as official Opposition.

"Surely, no one will ever seriously argue for the separation of this province on the basis that any new state would ensure its citizens greater individual freedoms, stronger economic and social security, a more advanced liberal democracy or a more compelling international contribution than Canada has provided for over 125 years."

Criticism and debate are the heart of democracy, he said, and politicians, no matter how offended, "must suffer in silence because such is the primary price of freedom."

About 450 people attended the black-tie dinner, organized by the Canadian Friends of TAU and under honorary chair Charles Bronfman, with father and son, Jack and Steven Cummings acting as co-chairs. Israeli statesman Abba Eban was guest speaker.

Mulroney was accompanied by wife Mila and their two oldest children, Caroline and Benedict.

The goal was to raise $1 million (U.S.) for the Brian Mulroney Institute for Canada-Israel Relations at TAU, scheduled to open next year. David Vineberg, chair of its endowment fund, said the institute's objective will be to "broaden understanding and cooperation between the two countries" through stronger academic links.

Ottawa survivor wants plaque as tribute to sister's memory

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Last spring, Anna Heilman stood in freezing drizzle near the spot in Auschwitz where her sister had been hanged 49 years earlier for helping blow up a crematorium.

Now, the Ottawa Holocaust survivor is hopeful Polish authorities will soon unveil a plaque at the one-time death camp that will pay tribute to her sister and three other women also publicly hanged for their role in the sabotage.

And Heilman is looking forward to the unveiling in Ottawa of a marker in memory of the four courageous women who smuggled gunpowder from an Auschwitz munitions plant into nearby Birkenau to blow up a gas chamber and Crematorium No. 4 on Oct. 7, 1944.

Heilman's older sister, Ester Wajcblum, then 20, was hanged along with Ala Gertner, Regina Safirsztajn and Roza Robota on Jan. 5, 1945 in front of over 2,000 female prisoners. Heilman's friends prevented her from watching the execution, and she remained behind in her barracks. But she can still hear the crowd's moans at the precise moment the scaffold gave way.

Three of the women were laborers at the Union Munitions Factory. After stealing and using the gunpowder to destroy the crematorium, one of them — Ala Gertner — was tortured by SS guards.

She gave them the names of the others, although Heilman claims Regina Safirsztajn played no part in the sabotage but was hanged because she was the women's supervisor.

Last public execution

It was the last public execution at Auschwitz. The camp was evacuated by the retreating Germans just two weeks later and liberated by the Red Army nine days after that.

It was during last spring's March of the Living, which took some 6,500 Jewish teenagers from around the world to Poland's death camps and then to Israel, when Heilman and some Canadian marchers held an emotional ceremony at Auschwitz.

They presented an English plaque in honor of the four heroines to Jerzy Wroblewski, the director of the Auschwitz museum.

That marker has been brought back to Ottawa for unveiling. And Heilman says Wroblewski has assured her that a permanent plaque in Polish has been cast but isn't yet ready to be put up at Auschwitz.

"He says there are a great deal of obstacles," Heilman told The CJN. "He didn't say what they are."

If erected, the plaque would be among the very few at death camp sites in Poland to actually state that most of the Nazis' victims (90 per cent at Auschwitz) were Jews, Heilman added. Most simply say that those murdered were Poles.

A monument to the four women was unveiled at Yad Vashem in Israel in 1991.

Heilman has been told the plaque would be placed at the ruins of the sole standing crematorium at Auschwitz.

— The above article corrects some innacuracies which appeared in a May 19 CJN story about Mrs. Heilman. The story was based on an English translation of a Polish newspaper account.

Edmonton shul gets first full-time rabbi

EDMONTON — Temple Beth Ora will welcome its first full-time rabbi to Edmonton this summer.

Rabbi Paul Sidlofsky, currently the associate rabbi at Temple Shalom in suburban Chevy Chase, Maryland, will take over the duties at Temple Beth Ora on July 1.

Cheryl Friedenthal, temple president, said the congregation is very excited about working with the new rabbi.

"This is a big step for our congregation," she said. "It will help us to achieve a new spiritual awakening, and we're really looking forward to sharing and growing as a congregation along with Rabbi Sidlofsky. We feel he has a great deal to offer us in terms of leadership, education, and helping us to develop ourselves Jewishly."

Rabbi Sidlofsky grew up in Toronto, where his family belonged to Holy Blossom Temple. Before being ordained at the Leo Baeck College in London in 1988, Rabbi Sidlofsky was a rabbinic intern at Holy Blossom, where his responsibilities included leading High Holiday services for the Toronto deaf community.

A 1983 graduate of the University of Toronto, where he was an Ontario Scholar, Rabbi Sidlofsky received a BA in English literature and minored in Near Eastern studies. In 1990, he was awarded an MA in Jewish education from the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion's Rhea Hirsch School of Education in Los Angeles. His thesis, "On the School and Synagogue: Toward a Symbionic Relationship," captures one of the rabbi's chief interests: educating people of all ages in Judaism.

Rabbi Sidlofsky says he believes that his primary function "is that of a teacher," and he is committed to making education central to the congregation.

At Temple Shalom, where he has been since 1992, Rabbi Sidlofsky directed a religious school that has nearly 400 students and more than 20 staff members. He has also run religious schools at synagogues in suburban Boston and Los Angles.

Rabbi Paul Sidlofsky

At Temple Beth Ora, Rabbi Sidlofsky will conduct Sabbath services, develop adult education programs, direct the Bet Sefer, teach bar and bat mitzvah students and work with the congregation's two youth groups.

Rabbi Sidlofsky's wife, Wendy, grew up in Washington, D.C. and received a degree in communication from Goucher College in Maryland. She has worked with the elderly in Suburban Washington, and has also been a substitute Sunday school teacher.

Both Sidlofskys are looking forward to their move north, and the members of Temple Beth Ora are excited to welcome them. They hope the rest of the Jewish community will join them in extending a warm shalom to their new rabbi and his wife.

School calendar discriminates against Jews, Supreme Court rules

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last week's ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada allowing non-Christians to miss work for their holy days without losing pay, while welcomed by the Jewish community, still leaves the fate of observant Jewish employees in doubt.

The court ruled 9-0 that three Jewish teachers working for a Catholic school board in suburban Montreal were wrongly docked a day's pay for missing work on Yom Kippur, 1985.

The teachers' union brought a grievance, and an arbitration board ruled that the school calendar in effect discriminated against the teachers, and that the school board had failed to take steps to accommodate them.

The arbitration board ruled the teachers should be paid for their absence on Yom Kippur. Quebec's Superior Court agreed with the board.

But Quebec's Court of Appeal reversed the judgment and set aside the arbitration board's award as "unreasonable." The court said the teachers sought "reverse discrimination" because they would have worked 199 days for the same salary as everyone else received for 200 days' work.

The Supreme Court of Canada decision overturns that ruling and states that the academic calendar (with Christmas and Good Friday off as paid holidays) "had the effect of adversely discriminating against Jewish teachers.

"As a result of their religious beliefs, they must take a day off work and, in the absence of some accommodation by their employer, must lose a day's pay to observe their holy day while the majority of their colleagues have their religious holy days recognized as holidays from work."

The decision, written by Mr. Justice Peter Cory, states the school calendar discriminates against members of an identifiable group because of their religious beliefs "and that the employers must take reasonable steps to accommodate" those adversely affected by employment rules.

But for observant Jewish teachers and other employees, the crux lies in the court's definition of reasonable as being anything short of undue hardship.

Needs of observant Jews bypassed

The ruling states that the observance of a holy day by Jewish teachers is a good reason for their absence and should qualify them for a day's wages.

But nowhere does it specifically address the unique needs of the fully observant, who conceivably could require not one or two days off, but up to 13 days off a year to observe Jewish holy days, provided all of them fall on a workday.

(The 13 are two for Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, two for Sukkot, one each for Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah, four for Passover and two for Shavuot).

Most collective agreements for teachers across Canada entitle them to three days off with pay (other than sick leave), if they have good reason to be absent. But for an observant teacher, that could mean as many as 10 unpaid days to observe holy days.

In fact, the ruling seems to go against the needs of the fully observant. While common sense and flexibility should apply, there are limits, the court noted.

For example, an employer would be justified in refusing a teacher every Friday off for religious reasons.

And a small company or an employer having financial difficulty could reasonably refuse an employee's request to have all Jewish holidays off with pay.

What's reasonable in prosperous times may be a burden in a recession or time of restraint, the court said.

The court found no evidence of the school board's inability to pay teachers Joseph Kadoch, Louise Elbraz and Jacob Lahmi for their day off, and in fact, it pointed out that until 1983, the board allowed its Jewish teachers to take Yom Kippur off with pay.

The decision will have varying effects on different parts of the country, said Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress.

But it should help teachers who do not have personal time written into their collective agreements and should also influence large corporations, such as banks, Farber said.

Max Bernard of CJC's Quebec region denied the ruling will lead to a flood of requests for religious days off with pay.

JDC celebrates 80th anniversary

MONTREAL — On June 6, a dinner in the Benjamin Franklin Room of the State Department in Washington marked the 80th anniversary of The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, Inc. (JDC), an agency founded in the early days of World War I to channel funds for the relief of Jews caught in the agony of wartime in Europe and Palestine. The celebration had a twofold significance for Joe Ain, a retired Montreal contractor.

As an eight-year-old living in war-ravaged eastern Poland in 1921, Ain tasted white sugar for the first time after it arrived in a relief package from the World Jewish Distress Organization, the forerunner of the Joint Distribution Committee.

Today, three-quarters of a century later, Ain is an honorary member of the board of directors of JDC, which still serves as the overseas arm of the North American Jewish community, aiding Jews and non-Jews alike by sponsoring programs of relief, rescue, reconstruction and Jewish education.

The number of people helped through eight decades reaches into the millions. There has been a JDC presence at one time or another in more than 70 countries in every continent except North America.

Canadians play significant roles in the activities of the New York-based JDC, which has an annual budget of about $60 million (US) for its work. Funds are contributed to the organization by the United Israel Appeal in this country, and Ain's son, Steve, is its executive director. Among JDC's directors are Andrea Bronfman and Hillel Becker of Montreal, and Albert Reichmann of Toronto.

Canadians also serve in the front lines in the field. Seymour Epstein of Toronto, for example, is a key player in work being carried out in the former Soviet Union and Albert Weizman of Montreal is involved in the extensive JDC programs in Morocco.

The founders of the organization thought it would be disbanded once the wartime emergencies were over, but the realities of 20th century Jewish life shattered that expectation. Rather than decreasing, needs have escalated and continue to do so.

JDC today has a set of global objectives, consisting basically of four primary functions: rescuing Jews in danger or distress; providing essential relief, food and shelter to Jews in need, with a special responsibility for Holocaust survivors; helping to reconstruct and strengthen Jewish community life and restore Jewish cultural and religious activities; and contributing to the vitality and social progress of the people of Israel by helping the Jewish nation make the most effective use of its social resources in the face of countless pressures.

In the former Yugoslavia, by March 1994 the JDC had rescued more than 2,100 people from Sarajevo — 1,001 Jews and 1,103 Muslims and Christians. One of the most striking examples of JDC determination and daring occurred last February. While refugees were in the act of boarding buses to take them away from the besieged city, a shell fell just 200 metres away, killing 65 people. JDC organizers resolved to have the evacuation continue and finished leading 116 Jews and 180 non-Jews onto the buses. After a long and arduous journey, the convoy reached safety in Makarska, Croatia.

The JDC now is resettling the displaced and homeless, providing food and medical supplies, and establishing hospital and educational facilities around the world. It responds to natural and manmade disasters, and contributes to development efforts in many countries.

Specifically, in Eastern European countries struggling with vast economic and political changes, JDC is providing life-sustaining assistance to elderly and infirm Holocaust survivors, even as it continues to help both young and old renew their Jewish heritage.

In addition, in the former Soviet Union, the agency is helping to rebuild the Jewish communal infrastructure and nourish the quest for Jewish knowledge. It also has been part of the U.S. government's non-sectarian program of food assistance.

In Africa and Asia, JDC helps dwindling Jewish communities to maintain essential services for their elderly and to provide a Jewish education for their children.

In Israel, JDC is helping the country absorb its newest immigrants while continuing to enrich the lives of the disadvantaged and improve the quality of services for the aged, handicapped and disabled.

Canadians attend Diaspora conference

Beilin stirs controversy

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Ezer Weizman last week opened, to mixed reviews, a much-anticipated two-day international conference on the changing relationship between Israeli and Diaspora Jews.

While participants praised the initiative, held in cooperation with the foreign ministry, some privately expressed doubt that anything meaningful could be achieved with the packed agenda and large crowd.

That crowd included a sizeable contingent from Canada, comprised of Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, Montreal community leader Yoine Goldstein, human rights activist Prof. Irwin Cotler and Julia Koschitzky of Toronto, world chair of Keren Hayesod's board of trustees.

"I'm not sure the format lends itself to the kind of exploration that the serious subject of the future of the Jewish family deserves," said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Some also criticized the dearth of young people and the absence of representatives of the opposition to the Israeli Labor-led government. The organizers said they had invited such representatives but were turned down.

No one could complain, however, for a lack of controversy at the conference. That was provided, perhaps characteristically, by Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin.

In his remarks, Beilin called for the scrapping of the Jewish Agency and World Zionist Organization, and replacing them with a new international Jewish body.

The existing partnership "tools" between Israeli and Diaspora Jews are anachronistic, Beilin charged, echoing arguments he has made in recent months.

The difference was that at the conference he outlined his vision of an alternative partnership institution.

He called for a democratic, voluntary membership organization, called Beit Yisrael. Its mandate would be to fund visits by all Diaspora Jewish youth to Israel, to support aliyah and Jewish education in the Diaspora.

He also called for a census of Jews in the Diaspora to identify and reach out to unaffiliated Jews.

Earlier this year, Beilin was censured for suggesting that fund-raising activities for Israel end, since the state no longer requires "charity."

Beit Yisrael, he explained, would be a mass membership organization. Unlike existing Zionist frameworks, its leaders would be democratically elected, Beilin said.

The key project of the new organization, Beilin said, would be bringing every young Diaspora Jew to Israel for a month at the age of 17, with a free, non-transferable ticket.

Some $200 million would be needed for the project, he said, which would be financed from membership fees as well as the Federations, the United Jewish Appeal, Keren Hayesod and private foundations.

Israel Bonds, he suggested, should be converted into a worldwide investment fund for Israel.

Beilin's remarks prompted some sharp responses.

Addressing the Zionist General Council in Jerusalem, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin made no bones about his dissatisfaction.

"With deep sorrow, I have to say that there is a certain person, a deputy minister, who has made remarks that are not in keeping with government policy," Rabin said without mentioning Beilin by name. "This is a lot of rubbish and the government is not bound by it."

Jewish Agency Board of Governors Chairman Mendel Kaplan remarked later that Beilin's proposal was "based on ignorance."

"He insulted his audience by not doing his homework and by shooting from the hip," said Kaplan. "His ideas don't merit discussion."

Yehiel Leket, acting chair of the Jewish Agency and WZO, dismissed Beilin's idea as "not serious" and said Beilin's remarks had "created confusion and embarrassment."

"I respect Yossi Beilin in political matters," said Leket. "He has a deep understanding of the Palestinians, (but) not much understanding of the Jews."

At the conference, more than 200 intellectuals and organizational leaders sweltered in the heat under a big tent in the back yard of the president's residence.

They listened to one speaker after another address the misperceptions each Jewish community has of the other.

And they heard various initiatives proposed to stave off the crisis of Jewish continuity in the Diaspora as well as of Jewish identity in Israel.

The first day's speakers included Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks; Letty Cottin Pogrebin of Americans for Peace Now; Michael Walzer of Princeton University; Hebrew University Prof. Steven M. Cohen; United Jewish Appeal Executive Vice President Rabbi Brian Lurie and former French Chief Rabbi Rene Samuel Sirat.

Weizman, who gave a rambling introductory address which disappointed and frustrated invitees, tried to enliven proceedings by asking questions and pressing for an exchange with those in attendance.

Weizman, who has offended Diaspora leaders in the past for implying that a full Jewish life can be lived only in Israel, repeatedly and candidly confessed his ignorance and his desire and willingness to learn more about Diaspora Jewish life.

At the same time he defended his posture as head of a Zionist state whose purpose "through all the years was to ingather all Jews back to Israel."

University presidents to visit Israel

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella will lead an unprecedented mission to Israel of 16 Canadian university presidents, from July 5 to 12.

The trip is intended to open and enhance exchange and research possibilities, as well as academic and other contracts between Canadian and Israeli universities, CJC says.

The group will visit seven Israeli institutes of higher learning: Haifa University, the Technion, Bar-Ilan University, Tel Aviv University, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the Weizmann Institute of Science and Hebrew University.

The Canadians are also scheduled to meet with Palestinian university leaders.

On the itinerary are trips to an Israel Defence Force base, the Golan Heights, Bethlehem, the Canada Centre in Metulla and Yad Vashem.

Scheduled are meetings with President Ezer Weizman, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Immigration Minister Yair Tsaban, Education Minister Amnon Rubinstein and Canada's ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector.

The presidents of the following universities are slated to attend: Dalhousie University, University of Waterloo, Carleton University, University of Ottawa, University of Saskatchewan, McMaster University, York University, Wilfred Laurier University, Memorial University, Mount Allison University, Saint Thomas University, Mount Saint-Vincent University, University of Toronto, Universite de Sherbrooke, McGill University and Simon Fraser University.

Cooperation urged among institutions

As well, the report recommends that an attempt should be made to encourage cooperation among various institutions.

The young adult population has two major challenges which the task force feels must be addressed: preparation for, finding and keeping decent jobs in today's difficult economic times; and finding mates who not only share their interests but will ensure the establishment of homes that will have a commitment to living Jewishly and to attaching themselves to the Jewish community.

Recommendations for this age group include "jobs wanted" programs, such as the ProMontreal program which brings together community members and young adults looking for work; mentoring; a serious attempt to reach young Jews on college and university campuses; and support services for young adult groups.

Community organizations, the report says, should take into consideration the need of young adults for meaningful participation. Also, attempts should be made to develop new young leaders, "who would establish bonds with each other as well as with established leadership."

These priorities, the report stresses, are not intended to replace or displace other recommendations of the task force, which include dealing with problems of adolescents, including reconciling Jewish ideals and demands with the world around them; the immigrant communities, especially the Russian and Israeli; the problems of the ever-increasing "sandwich generation;" divorce; and the lack of communication about services and programs that already exist.

The task force takes special note of the challenges of the intermarried family, encouraging counselling both before and after marriage, taking into account the sensitivities of the Jewish and non-Jewish partner, so as not to cut off the Jewish family members from the community.

While the task force urges the community not to abandon the intermarried Jew, it states firmly "that it is not in the best interests of those Jews, their partners, their parents and their children to pretend that intermarriage does not make a difference to the community.

"It does."

Those studying the report — and it merits serious study — will find particularly useful the overview sections detailing the different problems the task force sees the community facing now and in the future, as well as those discussing the composition of the Toronto community.

The Task Force consisted of Ruth Bass, Richard Berman, Austin Beutel, Naomi Brown, May Dalume, Sheldon Disenhouse, Mel Finkelstein, Tom Lobel, Frank Mayer, Patricia Rucker, Stuart Schoenfeld, and Elizabeth Wolfe; and for short periods Mark Halperin, Robbie Spier and Jessica Wyman. The group spanned age, profession and community involvement.

The Task Force met with some 40 groups representing all segments of the community, focus groups consisting of intermarried, assimilated or unaffiliated Jews; and it organized "think tanks" which tried to bring together people in small groups to discuss particular topics.

The full report is available at the Federation offices.

Recommendations adopted

Muslims, according to the recommendations, which the government adopted on Sunday.

While no restrictions will be placed on Jews and Muslims using the same central prayer hall, arrangements will be made to ensure there will be no contact between the two groups.

The commission also urged that security devices, such as those used in airports, be installed at the tomb.

Until these measures are taken, the panel determined, the site will remain closed, as it has been since the day of the massacre.

The panel further recommended that settlers who use their weapons for any reason be required to report immediately to the police regarding the circumstances under which they were used.

As a result of the panel's findings, permits allowing settlers to own and carry arms will now be reviewed annually, and the IDF's open-fire orders will be reviewed and reworded in the clearest possible language so that there can be no misunderstandings in the future.

In an effort to aid the police in maintaining order, the commission further recommended that firm action be taken against so-called "extreme elements" in the territories, including members of the now-banned Kach and Kahane Chai movements.

The panel approved the government's decision to ban the extremist groups, which it did within weeks of the massacre.

The law, the panel determined, must be "enforced energetically and all must be equal before it."

Within days of the Hebron massacre, the cabinet called for the formation of a commission to investigate the slayings.

In the ensuing six weeks of hearings, most of which were held in open session, the panel heard 106 witnesses, including Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, during 31 sessions.

While some witnesses said that ongoing tensions in Hebron prior to the killings made the incident entirely predictable, the commission in effect endorsed the opinion of the IDF chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Ehud Barak, who testified that the massacre had come like "a bolt from the blue" and that the act of one gunman was not something that could have been either foreseen or entirely prevented.

Members of both ends of the Israeli political spectrum expressed disappointment with the panel's findings.

Critics on the left noted that the Shin Bet General Security Services had warned more than once against the danger posed by extremist settlers.

Members of the political left were also critical that the panel did not recommend that the 400 settlers living among the some 70,000 Palestinians in Hebron be ordered to leave the West Bank town.

And on the right, settlers groups complained that the panel had not addressed the issue of what they see as repeated Palestinian provocations of Jewish settlers.

Reaction among Palestinian leaders was also critical.

Hebron Mayor Mustafa Natshe said, "The Army did nothing. The settlers are still there."

His words were echoed by Saeb Erekat, a leading PLO official from Jericho who was recently named minister of local government in the newly formed Palestinian governing authority.

"The report did not address the root of the problem — the settlers," said Erekat.

Nabil Sha'ath, minister of planning and international cooperation in the Palestinian authority, said a copy of the report had been sent to PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat in Tunis.

Sha'ath said the PLO leadership — which broke off its negotiations with Israel in the weeks following the Hebron massacre — would react to the commission's findings after it has had a chance to study it.

The News in Brief

Students Named to Represent Canada

TORONTO — Six outstanding science students have been chosen to represent Canada at this year's Bessie F. Lawrence International Summer Science Institute held on the campus of the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot.

Shawna Silver, of Toronto; Karen King (Belle River, Ont.); Lorin Hochstein (Montreal) and Joanne Tannenbaum (Montreal) will participate in the program with Prakash Chaudhari (Peterborough, Ont.), recipient of the Arthur and Beatrice Minden scholarship and Chris Umson (Winnipeg), who was awarded the Joseph Kerbel scholarship at the Canada-Wide Science Fair.

The Weizmann program, which is open to students entering university, focuses on research in medicine, environmental issues, alternative energy sources and the development of advanced technology.

Lab work, field work, lectures and a tour of Jerusalem are included in the program.

BBC Presses Ottawa

OTTAWA — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) is urging the federal government to help secure the protection of minority rights in Eastern Europe, press for increased international actions to curb the spread of right-wing extremism and press Arab states to abandon their boycott of Israel.

In a seven-page brief submitted recently to the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy by BBC's Institute for International Affairs and Department of Government Relations, the organization also recommended Canadian sponsorship of training programs in the area of minority rights.

The brief calls for the expansion of trade relations between Canada and Israel. It advocates Canadian involvement in the movement towards democracy by Arab states and the Palestinian authority in Gaza and Jericho, and in the promotion of international human rights standards throughout the Middle East.

Porush Loses Knesset Seat

JERUSALEM — The luck of the draw cost longtime MK Menachem Porush his Knesset seat earlier this month.

Porush, 78, has sat in the Knesset for 39 years as a representative of Agudat Yisrael, which along with another Orthodox party, Degel HaTorah, comprises the United Torah Judaism (UTJ) bloc.

A recent ruling by the Council of Torah Sages, the supreme council of UTJ, ousted Porush from the Knesset, but left the equally colorful Avraham Shapira, also a member of Agudah, still in the Knesset.

In 1992, when the current Knesset was elected and the UTJ bloc was formed, it was agreed that one of the two Agudah members would resign after sitting for two years in order to permit Avraham Verdiger, who remained waiting in the wings, to take his place.

But when the time came, neither Porush nor Shapira wanted to yield his seat.

Last week, the rabbis who comprise the Council of Sages decreed that lots should be drawn.

Porush took the result of the draw with equanimity, saying he had many other public duties to perform.

Commenting on his winning the draw, Shapira said: "It was apparently divine will that I should continue."

Hezbollah Reported on Alert

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah, under Iranian guidance, has put members on alert and is reorganizing cells across Europe to prepare and execute plans for terrorist attacks against Israeli interests, an Arab language Paris newspaper reported last week.

The June 17 story in Al-Watan al-Arabi, said that the foreign operations department of Hezbollah is planning to link up with Algerian fundamentalists in Germany and assassinations of Israeli and American diplomats, suicide operations against their embassies and legations and the taking of hostages.

It added that Western security sources were reporting that Tehran had sent for the legendary terrorist Carlos (Ilich Ramirez Sanchez, known as The Jackal) "from his place of residence in Finland."

Tel Aviv 13th Dearest City

GENEVA — According to a survey released here, Tel Aviv ranks 13th on a list of the world's most expensive cities.

The most expensive is Tokyo and the cheapest is New Delhi.

According to the survey, conducted by the Corporate Resources Group, a financial company, Tel Aviv is a more expensive place to live than Los Angeles, London, Frankfurt, Milan, Madrid, Amsterdam and Cairo.

Yohanan Bader Dies

JERUSALEM — Yohanan Bader, an early leader of the Likud Party, died here June 17 at the age of 93.

Bader was born in 1901 in Krakow, Poland, and fled the Nazis by escaping through Russia. A lawyer, he was a member of Knesset for 28 years during Likud's opposition status in the Israel government.

He was an active member of the Knesset's finance committee and was on the advisory board of the Bank of Israel.

After arriving in Palestine in 1943, Bader was a member of the underground group Irgun Zvai Leumi and was a disciple of Ze'ev Jabotinsky's Revisionist Zionists.

He was arrested and held by the British Mandatory forces between 1943 and 1945.

Bader wrote political articles for the Herut newspapers and was a member of the World Central Committee of Herut-Hazohar.

He retired from the Knesset in 1977, but continued as an adviser to the late Menachem Begin.

Klausenburger Rebbe Dies

NETANYA — Thousands attended the funeral this month of the Klausenburger Rebbe, Rabbi Yekutiel Yehuda Halberstam, head of the chassidic Sanz dynasty, who died at age 90.

Rabbi Halberstam was descended from a distinguished rabbinical family that also heads the Bobov Chassidim.

He lost his wife and all his children in the Holocaust, surviving to rebuild the court of Sanz first in New Jersey and then in Kiryat Sanz near Netanya.

Rabbi Halberstam established Kiryat Sanz and the Laniado Hospital.

His eldest son, Rabbi Zvi Elimelch Halberstam, and his younger son, Rabbi Shmuel David, were appointed rebbes of the two principal Sanz communities.

U.S., Israel Join Forces

WASHINGTON — Israel and the United States signed an unprecedented agreement this month to join forces to combat terrorism.

According to an anti-terrorism cooperation agreement signed at the State Department, Israeli and American officials will commit up to $20 million (U.S.) to develop advanced systems to fight terrorism.

In the coming weeks, the two sides will decide what specific projects to pursue and will establish a schedule and agenda for future projects.

The agreement with Israel marks the first time Washington has joined forces to combat terrorism.

An Israeli Embassy spokesperson refused to comment on the agreement, saying that "combating terrorism is a very sensitive issue and we do not discuss it publicly."

The State Department also refused to discuss the accord.

Swiss Cemetery Vandalized Again

ZURICH — Switzerland's oldest Jewish cemetery has been desecrated by unidentified vandals twice in the past four months, according to the Swiss Jewish newspaper Judische Rundschau.

More than 100 gravestones at the cemetery in Zurich were overturned in the latest attack, which took place last Friday.

It is estimated that repairs to the cemetery, which was opened in 1862, will cost some 45,000 Swiss francs, the equivalent of $30,000.

Last Friday, two visitors called police after seeing youths running from the cemetery.

Camp Barracks to be Rebuilt

BERLIN — The Jewish barracks at the former Nazi concentration camp of Sachsenhausen, destroyed by an arson attack in September 1992, are to be rebuilt with public funds.

The directors of the foundation for memorials in the state of Brandenburg, including Ignatz Bubis, head of Germany's Jewish community, have also decided to enlarge the museum at the site of the camp, north of Berlin.

And a new memorial will be put up at the site to recall the period following 1945, when the Soviets, who became the occupying power in eastern Germany, used the camp to incarcerate political opponents. From 1945 to 1950, about 50,000 people were imprisoned in Sachsenhausen, of whom some 15,000 died.

Between 1937 and 1945, under the Nazis, some 100,000 people, including an estimated 10,000 Jews, perished in the camp.

The directors of the Brandenburg memorials foundation had considered leaving the destroyed Jewish barracks as a memorial to present-day anti-Semitic violence.

Two young neo-Nazis were arrested on the eve of Rosh Hashanah last year for setting fire to the Jewish barracks at Sachsenhausen. They later recanted their confessions and were acquitted for lack of evidence.

"Lost opportunity" costs may be uncollectible

On June 2, 1994 the Supreme Court of Canada refused to hear the appeal of Deborah Elliot, a woman who had initially won a large lump sum from a lower court judge for her "lost opportunity" costs of marriage. In an earlier article, I explained that the initial judge at trial ordered Mr. Elliot to pay his wife a six figure sum in addition to the normal division of property and monthly support. This sum was calculated to compensate her for the future opportunity she lost in her career as a result of her staying at home to raise the children during the course of the marriage.

Cases like Ms. Elliot briefly triggered an entire industry of conferences, symposiums and economic assessments costing the Legal Aid Plan and clients thousands of dollars, often in a single case, so as to justify this type of order.

The Ontario Court of Appeal rejected this approach and, without giving any reasons, the Supreme Court of Canada won't even hear Mrs. Elliot's appeal and consider the merits of her case. This means that the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision is now the law of Ontario, and arguably, may be the law of Canada.

In my opinion, the result will make it very difficult for women to claim lump sum compensatory support in addition to periodic support in the future. The Divorce Act and the Ontario Family Law Act appear to allow for this kind of remedy. However, the courts are not disposed to hearing about ordering husbands to pay lump sums to adjust for the wife having incurred a "disproportionate share of the economic disadvantage of the marriage".

Is religion a purely private matter or is one's religion a public matter as well? The recent controversy over the banning of turbans and kippot by some branches of the Royal Canadian Legion again raises this issue.

The question is, of course, not new. The slogan of the Enlightenment in the 18th century was "a Jew at home and a mentsh in the street." The price that Jews expected to pay for acceptance into general society was to shed the outward signs that would make them unique and different when they mingled with their fellow citizens. They were to continue the practice of Judaism, but only within the confines of their homes.

Jews and Sikhs rightfully protest that the headgear ban is an example of intolerance, unacceptable in this multicultural society. Yet, I know Jews who might argue for a more tolerant policy, but who, in their own lives, regard Judaism as a private matter, not for public display. They may be Jews at home, but they want to be no different from the non-Jews among whom they live when they leave the house.

To be sure, we all feel the tension between our devotion to Judaism and our desire to reap the benefits we believe can be found in the non-Jewish world around us. We each resolve this tension in our own way. The way in which we resolve this tension has far reaching implications for the Jewish future.

We fight for the right of Jews to wear yarmulkes in Legion canteens. Do we fight strictly on principle, or do we fight because we ourselves would be willing to exercise that right?

We argue that the public schools ought to respect our holy days, but are we willing to keep our children out of school on religious holy days like Sukkot, Pesach, and Shavuot, when their absence will be conspicuous? We believe that our faith deserves the respect of our employers, but are we willing to publicly declare our pride in being Jewish by staying away from work on our sacred days?

The strength of the day school system here in Toronto is admired far and wide. Yet, I know parents who opt for the public schools because their priority is for their children to be acquainted with the multicultural society around us, rather than to become immersed in their own Jewish culture and religion. Presumably, these parents believe that their child's commitment to Jewish observance is strong enough to withstand whatever challenges they will face in public school. Or perhaps they feel that when their child leaves for school, some compromise of Jewish values is to be expected, so that their child can "fit in." I would suggest that we can "fit in" with a multicultural society, only after we have been thoroughly immersed in our own background, both at home and at school.

What our tradition asks of us is that we develop a deep devotion to Judaism in the privacy of our home, but that we proudly live that faith in public. The mezzuzah is placed on the outside of our doorpost so that our identity will be known to any passers-by. The Chanukah menorah is to be placed in our window so that we can make public the miracle of Judaism's survival.

If we keep our faith strictly private, what will our children say to us when we ask them to live publicly as Jews? Will they question the depth of our convictions?

We are described as a "light unto the nations." The task of the Jewish people is to be an example of righteous and ethical living to the nations of the world. We can only fulfil that task when we live our private faith in public as well as in private. Today, more than ever, Jewish continuity, and the well-being of the entire world demand that we be Jews in the street as well as Jews at home.

American teen thanks Israelis after release from Singapore

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Michael Fay, the young American sentenced to a caning in Singapore for vandalizing cars last autumn, thanked the people of Israel for "doing their best to help" him.

Upon his release from jail last Tuesday, Fay, whose father is Jewish and the son of Holocaust survivors, gave Israel Radio an exclusive interview in recognition of the interest the radio station had generated in his case.

A number of Israelis had reacted strongly to the story of the 19-year-old Fay and the flogging to which he was sentenced after pleading guilty to acts of vandalism.

Fay told Israel Radio that he had been punched in the face and head, and pulled from his chair by his hair during his interrogation at the hands of Singapore police officers.

He denied that he had spray-painted cars, but admitted that stolen traffic signs had been found in his possession.

He said that other youths caught during an anti-vandalism sweep had also been beaten by the police.

Received caning as sentence

Fay remained silent about his flogging, saying he would speak of that only when he was back in the United States.

When Fay was released, his father, George Fay, told reporters in Singapore that his son had survived the caning and 83 days of imprisonment better than he had expected.

After pleading guilty to the vandalism charges, Michael Fay was sentenced to six lashes on his bare buttocks with a rattan rod — but the penalty was later reduced to four after U.S. President Bill Clinton issued an appeal for clemency.

The youth was also fined $2,000 and sentenced to four months in prison, but the sentence was later reduced for good behavior.

George Fay told reporters that his son's Jewish background had "struck a chord in Israel" and that human rights groups there had joined the appeal on Michael Fay's behalf.

During his interview with Israel Radio, Michael Fay said that after the caning, he shook the hand of the person who administered the lashes, saying he had done so as a matter of pride.

Rabin in trouble over his Labor Party turmoil

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

Despite the traumatic aftermath of the Yom Kippur War, the voters renewed Labor's mandate, but Golda Meir's generation had to leave the scene to a younger and untrained team. This is how Yitzhak Rabin, Chief of Staff in the Six Day War and then ambassador to the United States, a military man in his fifties with no political record, became prime minister in 1974. He led his administration for three uninspiring years and lost to Likud's Menachem Begin in the 1977 elections.

Yeshayahu Anug

Fifteen fateful years later—a cool peace with Egypt and a controversial war in Lebanon in between — the country was tired of Likud's failures and gave Labor a new chance under Rabin. He seemed to possess the right mixture of leadership qualities. He undertook to restructure the budget, to reorder the national priorities, to invest in the neglected infrastructure of Greenline Israel and, above all, he promised peace with Israel's neighbors, to be reached by territorial compromise and secure military arrangements to guarantee the country's safety. Not everything went smoothly for Rabin during his first two years in office, but his achievements are quite impressive. His main asset throughout was his public image as a man who can be trusted.

He was indeed trusted by the majority of Israelis even when he abolished the dogma he himself had helped to formulate — that there would be no negotiations with the PLO. His handshake with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat was accepted by the public as a necessary development and his body language during the odd scene on the lawn of the White House only deepened public understanding. When he returned to Jerusalem and became the target of much vilification by the extremist right wing, his popularity remained intact.

Recently, obscure hints coming from that small sector of relentless fanaticism indicated that his ongoing peace efforts could well induce some deranged extremist to make an attempt on his life. Political blackmail or a threat disguised as a warning? In the present overheated atmosphere, nothing can be dismissed offhand as sheer absurdity. As we were reminded only recently, the effects of manipulated mass hysteria can be disastrous.

Rabin is still the most popular and trusted politician. His grip did not loosen within the moderate sectors either, when his unconditional allegiance to Israel's security needs, as he sees them, led him to authorize a number of hazardous security measures and operations that threatened to derail the peace process altogether. Nor when he switched emphasis from one peace partner to the other, from Syria to the PLO, or from these uneasy partners to Jordan and vice versa. His supporters attributed the apparent incoherence to tactical skill, his doubters to indecision. But the Likud opposition was partially disarmed by his hawkish policies in Lebanon and in the territories and by his handling of the peace negotiations with the Arabs. And as the peace process is now going on despite its frequent setbacks, it is not this facet of Rabin's leadership that is presently on trial, but his troubles within the party, his once reliable power-base.

He made several mistakes by either supporting the wrong candidates for important positions or in his attempt to enlarge his narrow government. Despite his proven readiness to make excessive concessions to the ultra-Orthodox Shas, he has so far failed to return them to his coalition. Now their conditions for rejoining include the request to fully immunize halachic rulings from the scrutiny of the Supreme Court.

The real test of Rabin as a party leader came shortly before the recent Histadrut elections — and he failed it. It was when the new Health-Plan of the then minister of health, Chaim Ramon, was turned down by his own Labor party, which had previously endorsed it. In protest Ramon resigned from the government, ran his own list of candidates and did much better than the official Labor list. Since then, and for more than a month, the losers practically refused to hand over the organization to his victorious team. Faced by their obstructionism, Ramon threatened to form a coalition with the Likud-faction, another casualty of his victory. Accused of betrayal, Ramon points to the fact that in order to block him, a number of local Labor leaders have themselves already formed coalitions with cooperative Likud representatives.

This imbroglio would be much less dramatic if only the party and the public knew where exactly Rabin himself stood in this power struggle. The impression is that he sympathizes with Ramon, but that he also hesitates to come out too decisively on his side. One can regard the struggle over the Histadrut as the beginning of the power struggle for succession in the leadership of the party. True, but meanwhile confusion is paramount and the disunity in the party affects its ability to function as the leading force in government. The crisis consumes all the energy and most of the time of its protagonists who were elected to govern and not to fight each other.

Friends and foes are now asking themselves how the prime minister could have painted himself into such a corner, and some ascribe this to his particular style of government. He seems to distrust his cabinet colleagues, including Shimon Peres, with whom he appeared to have worked smoothly until recently, in the conduct of the peace process. Both deny this firmly. But Rabin is evidently more comfortable with his fellow generals, and some of his civilian advisers have lately abandoned their posts. Together with disgruntled ministers with very oversized egos, they have fed the media with gossip about Rabin's short temper, his bad manners and his reluctance to listen to their advice.

Now that that teflon lining of Rabin's leadership shows cracks, the public is waiting for a renewed proof of his ability to put his house in order. As he still commands more prestige than all of his rivals in that divided party and even outside it, he should be able to recover by showing firm leadership. The testing ground could well be the peace process, by far the most challenging item on the national agenda, where an impressive breakthrough is overdue. Short of that, it seems, his administration and the hopes for peace may not survive the time left before the 1996 general elections.

If all this is known to his party critics, they ought to know also, that the ship they are now rocking is the one that keeps them afloat. But do they? Rabin dismisses their grudges and also seems to overrate his own skills as the skipper. He may be wrong on both counts.

Czechoslovakia and Canada: Two of a kind?

By VINCE BEISER

Tell me if this sounds familiar.

There's this country, which throughout its not-so-long history has been comprised primarily of two peoples, two nations very similar to each other but each having their own distinct language, history and culture. The people of the smaller nation, outnumbered two-to-one by the larger, complain loud and long and with a certain amount of justification that the larger group has always oppressed them. Not with death squads or mass arrests, you understand, but by imposing their language and culture on the smaller, and by treating them always with a certain condescension.

Frustrated after years of negotiations and various unsatisfactory constitutional adjustments, the smaller group elects a party into power in their part of the country that calls stridently, if somewhat vaguely, for the smaller nation to assert itself, to assume sovereignty in the area where they are the clear majority.

The larger group, meanwhile, has become a bit peeved with the endless complaining of the smaller and, truth be known, pretty sick of the whole issue. Nonetheless, opinion polls consistently show that a majority of people on both sides want to continue living together. Their leaders, however, continue to escalate the rhetoric, call each other's bluffs, and before their citizens really realize what is going on, split the country in two.

This is not a parable about Canada. It's what I watched happen two years ago in what was then Czechoslovakia, now the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

The parallels with Canada are of course not exact, but there are enough of them to give all of us pause in the midst of our increasingly acrimonious debate on national unity.

In Czechoslovakia, right the way through the process of separation, opinion polls showed that a majority of both Czechs and Slovaks did not want to separate. Yet the Slovaks had voted into power Vladimir Meciar's Movement for a Democratic Slovakia, on the strength of its vague promises to win more respect and freedom for the Slovaks from the Czechs. Meciar refused compromise after compromise with the Czechs, pushing ever harder for more concessions until the Czech leadership called his bluff and told him to go ahead and take Slovakia out of their federation.

The Czech government, headed by Vaclav Klaus, had their own motives. They had decided they could pull themselves out of the economic morass of Soviet-style socialism, where they had been trapped for decades, and re-enter the advanced capitalist world more quickly alone than with less-developed Slovakia in tow. Trapped by his own rhetoric, Meciar could not afford to back down. So Slovakia and the Czech Republic went their separate ways on Jan. 1, 1993. A solid democratic majority among both Czechs and Slovaks were opposed to this, but they had allowed their leaders to lead them to a place where there was no choice.

What have the Slovaks gained with their new independence? Well, they now have their own flag, their own banknotes, and they get to speak Slovak and only Slovak everywhere in Slovakia (To do business anywhere outside of Slovakia and the Czech Republic, of course, they have to switch to English or German.) They also got a dizzying array of economic afflictions, including 20 per cent unemployment and a drastically devalued currency, which were either caused or made worse by the sudden loss of trade with the Czechs, formerly their biggest trading partner. The Czechs, although less hard hit, also suffered severe economic disruption from the overnight appearance of an international border in the middle of what had been their single country. Both countries, especially Slovakia, also lost much of their attraction for investors thanks to all the uncertainty and instability of their breakup.

Today, the Czechs are well on their way to joining the club of wealthy Western European nations, largely because they are encouraging Germans and Austrians and whoever else they can to buy up as much of the country as they like. Slovakia is still in dire economic straits, its relations with neighboring Hungary are increasingly tense, and the party that led it to independence has splintered into mutually hostile factions, paralyzing the government.

I do not mean any of the foregoing as an argument for or against Quebec staying in the Canadian Confederation. I do mean it as an argument for knowing what we are getting ourselves into, for thinking the full consequences of what we are talking about before we actually do it — and for not allowing the rhetoric and political needs of our supposed leaders to lead us somewhere we don't want to go.

Town displays solidarity with Jewish community

By HILLEL KUTTLER

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Last winter, when skinheads threw cinderblocks through the window of a Jewish home displaying a chanukiah, the community of Billings, Montana, rallied.

The Billings Gazette published full-page drawings of a chanukiah and townsfolk pasted them in their windows.

Unable to distinguish the Jewish homes from those of non-Jews, the skinheads — who were aligned with such white supremacist groups as Aryan Nation and the Ku Klux Klan — ceased further attacks.

No sooner had the hate campaign begun than it was crushed.

In recognition of the town's solidarity, the American Jewish Committee, at its annual dinner, recently presented Billings Police Chief Wayne Inman with a special citation. In making the award, organization director David Harris evoked the World War II-era Danes who helped smuggle 7,500 Jews to Sweden, and Bulgarians who refused to deliver Jews to the Nazis.

The incident became a model for a community overcoming its enemies.

It also validated the recent urgings of Inman, 51, who had arrived in Billings just a year earlier after 28 years on the Portland, Oregon, police force. The Montana native and Marine veteran retired from the Portland force, because he wanted to get away from the "big city."

In 1992, Inman first saw racist fliers after he was named top cop in Billings with its population of 81,000. He "naively believed, though we had skinheads in the city, their influence wouldn't be critical."

Even today, he estimates the skinheads in Billings number a half-dozen.

But when additional anti-Jewish, anti-black and anti-homosexual leaflets appeared six months later during a Martin Luther King Day march, Inman decided to take a stand.

Threats had been made against the tiny Jewish community of 240 (including those in surrounding Billings County) in the previous few years.

First, Jewish cemeteries were vandalized during the High Holy Days in 1992. Then came the Martin Luther King Day and Chanukah incidents last year.

"The next step was property destruction, assaults and death," Inman said in an interview here. "I wanted to intervene at the earliest possible stage. I explained in the best way I could: 'These folks represent a substantial threat to our community over time; let's face it now.' "

The police chief's awareness of the danger facing minorities dated from the 1988 beating death of Ethiopian immigrant Mulegatis Serew by Portland skinheads.

After the leafleting incident, Inman brought his message to schools and churches. He told people they didn't understand the problem if they really believed the solution was to not cast a spotlight on the hatemongers.

The turning point was a May 1993 rally for tolerance in which 600 citizens turned up.

"It said to me: we have a city that is aware and moved out of the classic denial they were in," Inman said. "It's a story we want to tell — good triumphs over evil," he stated, adding that the town's response has resonated across the United States, because "we're so hungry for good news in this country."

The conductor of the city's symphony orchestra, Uri Barnea, believes that Billings responded the way it did because the victims were familiar faces.

"Racial bigotry against American Indians is commonplace," said the Israeli-bred Barnea, who has himself faced periodic threats by extremists during his 10 years in Billings. "But when it happened all of a sudden to the middle class, the Jewish community, . . . it immediately touched the hearts and minds of people who know us personally.

"It could have been that complacency, as far as other minorities [were concerned], was not the case [here]," added Barnes, emphasizing that this was just his hypothesis.

Gazette publisher Wayne Schile said: "Though I think this is a wholesome and well-meaning community, this was an opportunity to address something we have not been used to in this community; namely: hate crimes."

Inman attributed the community's behavior to its Great Plains culture: "There has to be a common sense of justice and fair play, and Montana has that. It comes from the frontier spirit where we take care of our neighbor. In the same way cities rally when there's a flood, an earthquake, cities rally against hatred."

Asked about Billings's response to the hate in its midst, Anti-Defamation League national director Abraham Foxman said, "It wasn't so much an act of courage in Billings as moral leadership."

But he acknowledged it represented an exception to the norm.

"What we haven't been able to find so we can clone," Foxman said, "is what makes the people of Billings, Montana, stand up and say 'No.' "

Though Inman stood up to the Klan, he still exercises caution, because he has been threatened by the Klan. He declines to give the first names or hometowns of his two grown children, who were influenced by his law enforcement career. His son is a police officer in Oregon and his daughter is an investigator in California.

The reward of hate

A crime is at minimum an affront to person or property. The same crime inspired by hate though, is even more. It is an affront to person, property and to dignity. Like a dart dipped in poison it causes a wound far greater than the mark it leaves. As it attacks the individual, it also corrodes society.

Therein lies the justification and the wisdom in the Bill tabled earlier this month in the House of Commons by the Federal Government.

As part of an omnibus bill on sentencing reform, Minister of Justice Allan Rock introduced amendments to the Criminal Code which will compel judges, when passing sentence on someone convicted of committing a crime, to determine whether bias, prejudice or hate, based on religion, color, sexual orientation gender, age, mental or physical disability, or nationality formed part of the crime.

If the crime was motivated or aggravated by hate, the bill will allow the sentence imposed on the individual to be more severe.

We commend the Minister. It is an important and welcome initiative.

As this newspaper has often argued, thwarting the evil of the hatemonger is a complicated multi-layered task involving the commitment, courage and action of government at all levels, law enforcement authorities, schools, organizations and individuals.

The proposed amendment is a tangible action by the government in leading society's fight against the perpetrators of "hate crime." It is an expression of Canadian society's disgust with such people and of its determination to more effectively deter such criminal behaivior. As Irving Abella, the national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress pointed out, it sends "a powerful message."

The government thus deserves and has rightly received credit for its action.

However, we must also point out as has B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights that, while praiseworthy, the initiative is neither ground-breaking nor innovative. In fact many Canadian judges of their own volition already consider whether hate was a factor in a crime, when they impose sentence. Nor is the proposal especially bold; indeed it is quite modest. There are many jurisdictions which have broader definitions of hate-based crimes and which direct judges to impose minimum jail sentences for people convicted of committing a crime motivated by hate.

Democracy defends minorities. Canada — where the "preservation and the enhancement of the multicultural heritage" of its minorities is enshrined in the constitution — must defend them vigorously. Let the purveyors of hate and those whom they inspire to act out their hatred know this.

And let them also know, finally, that the reward of their hatred will be greater, more exacting punishment.

Turmoil in Egypt

Since the assassination of former Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat by a Muslim fundamentalist, current president Hosni Mubarak has been walking a thin line in his attempt to lead Egypt through the shoals of political and religious turmoil.

The challenges he faces are monumental: a population increase nearing the Malthusian danger point, a bureaucracy riddled with inefficiency and corruption, and an unemployment and housing problem teetering on catastrophe.

If this were not enough, Egypt is now facing a fundamentalist insurgency that in the last two years has taken the lives of 400 police officers, government officials and terrorists.

It has been only by dint of supreme resolve that Egypt under Mubarak has not already experienced melt-down. The Egyptian president has avoided this through the judicious use of his intelligence units and army cadres, both of which have waged a relatively effective war against elements which have openly called for the destruction of the current regime.

Now it appears that President Mubarak, having neutralized one set of opponents, has turned his attention to the Muslim Brotherhood, a shadowy organization which functions as religious society, labor union and social welfare agency. Egyptian authorities assert the Muslim Brotherhood has had links with organized violence against the government.

Western authorities should think twice before criticizing Mubarak's often draconian prosecution of the battle against terrorism — a battle moreover, which has badly hurt tourism to Egypt. Those who are working to destroy Egypt do not play by the rules of the game and it is sometimes necessary for the Mubarak government to exercise war powers against an internal enemy.

It is in Israel's interest, and for that matter the West's interest, that Egypt remain a stable force in the Middle East. The Mubarak government is an imperfect one, but it has done much to promote peace in the area. It also played a major role in the Israel-PLO accords. A fundamentalist Egypt along the lines of radicalized Iran — the dream of anti-government militants today — is unthinkable.

HIS HOLINESS' HAT

Regarding your article, "Montreal Legion Branch Rejects Bylaw Against Turbans, Kippot," which appeared in the June 16 issue.

I am a veteran, having served in the RCAF. I am angry about this [ban] as I consider it to be blatant racism and anti-Semitism.

The Pope and cardinals of the Roman Catholic church wear skullcaps similar to kippot. Would these clergy be forced to remove them upon entering the Legion Hall? I don't think so.

ACCEPTABLE JEWISH BEHAVIOR

I have just read the article about Gay Pride Month in Israel. I could be prepared to accept the fact that being homosexual is not aberrant behavior and that in the world at large it might be acceptable. However, in the same way that the eating of pork is not abnormal behavior, nonetheless it is not acceptable Jewish behavior.

And even though there are many Jews who eat pork, it would not be proper or acceptable to the vast majority of Jews to have a Pork-Eaters Pride Month. Of course, just as pork-eating Jews have civil rights, those who practise homosexuality have civil rights and just as there is no pork-eaters synagogue, why should there be a gay synagogue?

Our guide to proper Jewish conduct — even if we do not follow it on a personal level — should be the document that defines what Judaism is and how a Jew should live — the Torah. And just as it says that for a Jew, eating pork is wrong and keeping Saturday as the Sabbath is right and that one should be good to one's fellow man — it also says that for a Jew, homosexuality is very wrong. (Leviticus 18:22)

And therefore it should not be supported by Israel in any way. Of course, this reasoning should also apply to those who wish to support the "same-sex" legislation.

REMEMBERING THE REBBE

It has been several days since the Jewish people have lost their Rebbe. I'm not going to write a tribute to the Rebbe as that can best be left for others. I feel I must however address the issue of the response of Klal Israel to his passing. To all the millions who stood in line for dollars; who stood in line for a brachah, to the baalei teshuvah; to those who were childless and conceived; to those who were sick and were cured; to the hopeless who found hope; to those whose businesses were failing and prospered, we all owe much to our Rebbe.

Do not let this opportunity to stand up for the Rebbe and all that he believed in pass by. Unfortunately, many misguided and cynical people have found it fashionable to destroy the work of the Rebbe. The Rebbe was a true martyr of the Jewish people and indeed the world. One did not have to become a Lubavitcher to feel the grief. Those who took a shiur, put on tefillin, danced on Simchat Torah, or lit a candle, please don't let the flame go out. Chabad Lubavitch has a monumental task ahead and needs your help and blessing. Let us hope that we will all act in a proper and respectful manner so that we will merit the coming of Mashiach speedily in our days.

RELIGIOUS SCHOOL PROGRAM

In the article, "Federation CJA after hours Jewish school a first," which appeared in the May 19 issue of The Canadian Jewish News you noted that Shaar Hashomayim has a supplementary school program. As well, you mentioned that the Royal Vale and Merton public schools have supplementary Jewish instruction after school.

Unfortunately your article did not mention that Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom has a religious school program. Our program meets on Saturday mornings from 9 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. and Wednesday afternoons from 4:30 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. We also have a West Island satellite program which meets on Monday afternoons from 4:30 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. at the West Island College.

Our religious school has operated for many years and has an excellent curriculum and staff. We are proud to be part of the Montreal community involved with Jewish education.

HONOR THY FATHER

Re: "Happy Father's Day," CJN June 16.

Instead of martyring their brains and buying useless gifts, may I suggest to all children and grandchildren to make a donation in honor of their father or grandfather to a charity of their choice.

As I am not impartial, may I strongly suggest a donation to UJA, the only charity for the total Jewish community, honoring those who made this community what it is today.

MORE SHAYNA MAIDEL

Re: Review of A Shayna Maidel, May 5.

Since I had been away for awhile I am now catching up on some old CJN articles. Ben Rose's review of A Shayna Maidel caught my eye because of my history and interest in Holocaust related material.

Mr. Rose writes that he has a problem with this play because he finds it "unbelievable." From his description of the plot (I'm sorry now that I missed the play) it sounds as though there might have been some exaggeration, but the general premise seems valid. The idea being put forward seems to touch some raw nerves, especially in parts of the population who have guilt feelings about not doing enough for their brethren during the Holocaust. And, I would put it to Mr. Rose that there were many instances in which our own fell short of the mark when it came to doing whatever possible under the circumstances. If interested, I can give personal and general examples of such cases.

Theatre quite often uses exaggeration to make its point. It's the nature of the medium. Where television or film can use "realism," the stage must create an atmosphere within limited boundaries.

I cannot judge a piece of theatre that I haven't seen. I may have liked the production; I may not have, but, as a critic I think Mr. Rose used some very personal attitudes to gauge this particular show. That's fair. But it should be acknowledged.

Harry Finkelstein

Ben Rose responds: In my opinion, A Shayna Maidel is a bad play, period. I have reviewed many plays about the Holocaust and this is the first I found lacking in integrity and credibility. The "guilt trip" theory is not valid in my case.

Gentiles speaking Yiddish in Germany

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

It's one of the more unlikely tidbits of modern life: Germans speaking Yiddish as their personal language — and not a single Jew anywhere in sight.

Wuerzburg is a lovely old university town in south-central Germany. It has a distinguished cultural tradition and in the good old days had a renowned rabbinical seminary. Then came the Nazis and soon all the Jews were gone.

Rabbi Plaut

But a strange remnant persists. Where Jews once spoke their own language, Gentiles are still carrying on in the same manner and with the same sounds, even though the Jews have not returned.

It is indeed an unlikely scenario, and I knew nothing about it until I saw an unusual video made in Germany which has the simple title They Were Our Neighbors.

The director, Harry Raymon, had a young high school student from Wuerzburg take two Gentile friends around the neighborhood to show them something of the Jewish community, both past and present. Among these were traces of an unused mikvah underneath a Protestant church, a memorial tablet for the dead of former wars, and another for the victims of the Holocaust.

What fascinated me above all was a visit the three students made to a little town in the area. Called Schopfloch, it had the distinction of being one third Jewish in pre-Hitler days, and it was the locale of a most unusual development.

The Jews were merchants, with cattle dealers predominating. As in many parts of central and western Germany, they had preserved their Western Yiddish, which they used to communicate with each other in situations when they did not want outsiders to know what they were saying.

It was a kind of family language with which I too grew up. Even though we had lived in the country for some 400 or more years and spoke high German at home, our talk was flavored with dozens of such terms as schmontzes bar-yontzes, ausgebackene lecho-daudis, and emes bajazzo, to name just a few which enlivened our daily speech.

In Schopfloch, however, with so many Jews in town, this kind of talk became common amongst Gentiles as well. Jews must have jocularly referred to it as their personal "loshen kodesh" (holy tongue), which in Schopfloch the Gentiles heard as "lochaudisch." That is the way it is still known — and I could hardly believe my ears when I heard modern day Schopflochers use it as their daily speech. Language is a hardy thing and especially so when it can survive the horrors of the Nazis.

I don't believe there are any Jews left in the little town, but the Gentiles are keeping up the tradition. It has become their language, their own lingo, which they use as a personal dialect inaccessible to outsiders — the way the Jews had used it.

Even amongst those quite familiar with Yiddish, the presence of a western branch which was once spoken in Germany is practically unknown. Werner Weinberg's wonderful little book, Die Reste des Judisch-deutschen, reproduces the whole rich vocabulary with which I grew up. I had always thought of it as a part of our own family tradition, and only later discovered that Jews throughout western Germany were still spicing their talk with such expressions.

In my youth these were of course "extras" and no longer the complete language it had once been. But back in the 17th and 18th centuries Western Yiddish was still the common tongue of Jews living in Germany. It had added German words to its vocabulary, just as in Eastern Europe, Yiddish had added Russian and Polish words. Both Eastern and Western Yiddish were branches of the same tree: a mix of old German with Hebrew and local additions, creating a product that assumed a character all of its own. In twentieth century Germany it had become nothing more than a flavoring of the way we spoke, while in Eastern Europe it remained the daily speech of millions.

If you are interested in knowing some of the terms that we used — and how the above words related to Jewish tradition, look at Weinberg's book.

Mideast peace would affect education in Israel

By LISA SAMIN
World Zionist Press Service

In Israel, fifth grade geography students learn to chart a course from Japan to Israel. Unable to enter Arab states, they used to bypass Jordan, Iraq and other countries inaccessible to Israelis.

Until a few months ago, students from Grades 1 to 12 learned the PLO was an outlawed terrorist organization. Now, they are Israel's peace partners.

Since Israel's establishment, history, geography, civic studies and other humanities courses were taught in light of the official state of war with Israel's neighbors. After the 1967 Six Day War, the 1973 Yom Kippur War, and the 1979 signing of the peace treaty with Egypt, Education Ministry officials were continually correcting and changing textbooks and curriculums to reflect new realities.

However if real peace comes, the implications will require a mass revision by the Ministry of Education. According to Doron Shohet, director of the division for democracy at the ministry, controversial issues and events relating to the peace process are already being dealt with in classrooms all over the country, and plans for a new, forward thinking, peace-oriented curriculum are underway.

"We are continually introducing new educational activities and projects into the schools to teach about democracy and the developing peace process," said Shohet, whose unit has just come out with a teaching manual entitled The Way to Peace. It is the first bilingual Hebrew-Arabic teachers' guide published by the ministry.

However, according to a ministry spokesperson, it is up to each school to decide which activities, projects and materials they will use.

"There are so many issues involved and so many sides to them. Our job is to try to present the different points of view and to help the children understand the peace process," said Shohet. Students, he says, should be given the opportunity to express their opinions, with no judgment of what is good or bad in the discussions.

The ministry works with teachers in the field and in training courses for each grade level, as well as helping them conduct the sometimes volatile political discussions. Through simulations, debates and role playing, the students get an insight into the complexities of the peace process in a democracy.

Co-existence activities have been introduced into many schools, and meetings between Palestinian Arab students and Israeli Jewish students are no longer uncommon. In East Jerusalem Palestinian students study under the Jordanian educational system and are not part of the co-existence initiatives.

Moshe Ilan, director of curriculum development at the Ministry of Education, says a whole reshaping of attitudes will need to take place if peace comes. "There is a lot of hope and fear among students and adults alike concerning the peace process," said Ilan. "We need to address the different attitudes and incorporate them in a non-threatening way."

The pedagogic secretariat of the Ministry of Education, the ministry's highest professional policy-making body, is now organizing a planning committee for peace issues in the national curriculum.

"The issues we are dealing with are constantly changing," said David Gordon, secretariat director. "The most important factor is flexibility."

The committee, a microcosm of Israel's teaching profession, consists of professional teachers from elementary through high schools. According to Gordon, it will begin its work this spring.

Teacher training seminars play an important role in the process. Itai Zimran, dean of the David Yelin Teachers College in Jerusalem, said "We have increased our student teachers' awareness of current events. We have also developed a quality co-existence program involving our Jewish and Arab student teachers, our faculty and children from neighboring Jewish and Arab communities."

Zimran believes in time the Education Ministry's programs will be implemented at the college as well as in in-service training courses. Meanwhile, he says, it is important to deal with the issues at hand.

Daniel Fried, a veteran high school teacher, agrees with Zimran. "The changes will be gradual. It won't be that the kids walk into class one day and all the textbooks are different."

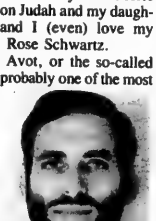
Whatever the outcome of the peace process, the Ministry of Education will have to grapple with how to present the peace to Israel's children, giving them the tools needed in a democracy to judge for themselves what is best for the future of their country.

More on what the 'Excitable Fathers' would say

By ALLAN GOULD

Look, I admit it: I love my wife Merle and I love my son Judah and my daughter Elisheva, and I (even) love my mother-in-law, Rose Schwartz.

But I also love Pirke Avot, or the so-called "Ethics of the Fathers," probably one of the most popular books ever written by the Jews. (Although Mordecai Richler has often sold pretty well, too.)



Allan Gould

Well, when I came across a sympathetic modern version of that great text, I could not help but to share it with you. We've managed to go through the first four chapters, so far; here is Chapter V of Perky Abbos (or The Excitable Fathers); don't say I didn't warn you:

THE PERKY ABBOS (EXCITABLE FATHERS), CHAPTER FIVE

1. With 10 sayings was the world created. Why not five? Or even two? Because Jews can never seem to quiet down. No wonder our phone bills are higher than the federal deficit of the United States.

2. There were 10 generations from Zayde Moishe to young Jason. Sometimes it really amazes me that we are still Jewish, when I think about it.

3. There were only two generations between Irv and Morris, and yet they still couldn't get along. Ach.

4. Our uncle Abe had 10 trials, but he had a good lawyer, so he got off.

5. There were a lot of miracles in Egypt and many more at the Red Sea. But the real miracle is "Matzah with Fibre." How on earth did our bubbies and zaydes survive without it?

6. Ten plagues were brought upon the Egyptians. If only a similar number would be brought upon Revenue Canada, I might have a chance.

7. We have had many trials and many tribulations in our family, but Auntie Chaya is surely the greatest one of all.

8. Many miracles were accomplished for our fathers at Temple Beth Weinstock, a Reform synagogue in our neighborhood: No woman was without a seat on Yom Kippur. No one ate pickled herring immediately before Kol Nidre. No unforeseen accident prevented the rabbi from giving her endless sermons (sadly). It never rained during Sukkot, when all the decorations were up. Though we did run out of seats on Rosh Hashanah, enough people were vacationing in Florida that no one got left out and threatened to sue. No one ever got injured by an Egged bus in Jerusalem on a mission. And no one ever got bumped from their Haifa hotel, either. Whew.

9. Many things happen just before Pesach: There's an irresistible sale on fresh challah that you cannot resist. Uncle Arnie is suddenly released from jail, with nowhere to go for the second night, which is a powerful argument for becoming Reform Jews, or making aliyah to Israel, where they keep only one night. Sammy forgot to sell the chametz again. The stupid chicken soup burned to a crisp. And to top it all off, Suzy brought home a friend for the seder who's a strict vegetarian, and tofu is chometz. It really is tough to be a Jew, lemme tell you.

10. There are many marks of an uncultured man and a wise man. An uncultured man rents a video, totally forgetting that it will be showing on pay-TV next week. An uncultured man talks about returning Tel Aviv to the Palestinians, when we Jews built the city, for heaven's sake. An uncultured man asks how someone's daughter is doing, when, if he only listened to his wife, he'd have remembered that she had recently run off with a Buddhist and broken her mother's heart. But a wise man does the reverse of all those things, thank the L-rd.

11. Many kinds of punishment are given for many kinds of sin. A bad stock market tip. A crooked business partner. A stale bagel. A super-persistent UJA campaigner. An overdrawn Visa bill. Cats that shed everywhere. Oy.

12. When does sickness come? When you don't take your vitamins. When you forget to wear your galoshes. When you have a lousy medical and dental plan at work, one with 6,000 loopholes.

13. There are four different types of men, although Rabbi Lisa insists that they are all the same: He who says, What's mine is mine and that's that. This sounds like Uncle Hymie. He who says, What's mine is yours and yours is yours — he'll be collecting welfare, soon enough. The one who says, What is mine is yours and yours is mine — he probably has a lot less than you. He who says what is mine is mine and yours is mine, probably works for the federal government, tax division.

14. There are four types of balabatim, a.k.a. synagogue board members: One is a pain in the head, another is a pain in the heart, another is a pain in the butt. The fourth is just a pain. You get the idea.

15. There are four types of student: The tired, the exhausted, the confused and the lost. Which brings me to the old question: Why on earth did you go into Jewish education?

16. There are four kinds of tzedakah givers: Those who have to be reminded, those who have to be called again, those who must be asked, and those who give without being asked. Where the last one is hiding, I have no idea whatsoever.

17. There are four characteristics of students: One who learns, but forgets. One who learns, but also forgets. One who doesn't learn, but remembers what he didn't learn in the first place. One who gives the teacher a two-dollar gift when his parents are millionaires. Go figure.

18. Ones who sit before a wise man are four in type: A smart one. A wicked one. A stupid one. One who lacks the capacity to inquire. Now, where have I heard this before?

19. What is love? Oh, I wonder, wonder, who, be-do-be-who? Who wrote the Book of Love? Probably Harlequin Romances.

20. Fight for heaven and you'll end up in heaven. Fight over total narishkeit, and you're probably in politics.

21. Cause others to be righteous, and it'll pay off. Cause others to be wicked, and it could well pay a lot better. I mean, look at the Mafia.

22. Abraham our father had good eyesight, great humility and modesty. While your synagogue board members tend toward the evil eye, and vanity. And as for humility? To work with these guys, you'll never be so humiliated in your entire life.

23. Judah, son of Allan, said: Be strong like bull. Be fast like Egged bus driver. But remember: It is safer to serve in Gaza than to drive between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

24. He also used to say, whether anyone asked him his opinion or not: At 5, you should be studying Torah. At 10, you should study Mishnah. But by midnight, you really should get to bed. They get up very early around here.

25. Ben Ben Beg Beg said said: Take the Torah and turn it, but don't drop it, unless you plan to fast for 40 days. You might want to follow its laws, too; there are some pretty smart things in there, you know.

26. Benny Henny Haa Haa said said: You work hard, you live on Easy Street. Well, if you work for gentiles, maybe. If you work for Jews, better find a slum to live in, and a good food bank. I've never figured out why this is true, however.

Allan Gould is the author of 20 books. Among his favorites are his Jewish ones: The Unorthodox Book of Jewish Records and Lists (humor), and What Did They Think of the Jews (an anthology of Gentile comments through history). But he also loves his other major anthology, The Great Big Book of Canadian Humor. Then again, he loves his family, but makes no money from them, either.

The infamy of Mauthausen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mauthausen, that notorious concentration camp in Upper Austria, was really a multi-headed monster. Not counting the main camp of Mauthausen, it consisted of 49 satellite camps extending across the length and breadth of Austria. Branch camps included Redl-Zipf, Hartheim Castle and Melk.

The population of Mauthausen and its subsidiaries reached a peak of 84,500 inmates in March 1945, two months before Nazi Germany's surrender. Conservatively, Mauthausen claimed 119,000 victims, of whom nearly 39,000 were Jews.

Mauthausen, the core camp, was not geographically isolated. It lay only four kilometres from the town of Mauthausen. So how did Austrian civilians in the vicinity respond to the evil so close at hand? In general, they collaborated with the Nazis, writes Gordon Horwitz, an American historian, in his revealing book, In the Shadow of Death: Living Outside the Gates of Mauthausen (The Free Press, $22.95 U.S.) To the best of my knowledge, this is the first book in English to gauge the attitudes of civilians living near a concentration camp.

Mauthausen, the town, was in a bucolic region known for its rock quarries. Accessible by road and rail, it proved an ideal setting for a concentration camp. Mauthausen — which received its first prisoners in August 1938 — was good for the local economy, since it revived the moribund stone industry. The SS-owned-and-operated quarries there, built on slave labor, provided material benefits for the town of Mauthausen.

Mauthausen, the camp, purchased goods and services from local merchants, farmers, artisans and tradesmen, while SS personnel and their wives patronized local stores.

There was no question but that local people knew of Mauthausen's existence and purpose. Indeed, Horwitz observes that the SS encouraged the dissemination of such information as an implicit yet deliberate warning to opponents of the regime.

As time passed, he adds, the civilian population in Mauthausen was increasingly exposed to the sight of mistreatment, brutalization and murder of camp inmates. As well, townspeople had to put up with boorish SS men who fired their guns in public, engaged in brawls and poaching, and desecrated religious shrines. Complaints were lodged, but no action was taken against the transgressors, who, Horwitz writes, were "above the law."

Hartheim Castle, 30 kilometres from Mauthausen, gassed and burned its prisoners. A cadre of local assistants, drawn largely from the surrounding population, took part in the killing process. They selected the victims. They collected their clothing and inspected their teeth for gold. They moved them to the place of extermination. They were sworn to silence, but news of the atrocities got out. The sickening odor of burning bodies wafted into homes, so that "traces of murder filled the air."

On pain of severe punishment, residents were warned not to spread rumors about the odors. Duly intimidated, they remained silent. In his research, Horwitz discovered that the vast majority of workers at Hartheim Castle belonged to the Nazi party. But in all fairness, it should be mentioned that they discovered the true nature of their jobs only after their arrival at Hartheim Castle.

In Redl-Zipf, some 70 kilometres southwest of Mauthausen, most local residents resigned themselves to the brutality of the camp, although some strongly disapproved of what they saw. They feared that if they protested they would be arrested. One respondent told Horwitz that there was an unwritten law: "do not talk, do not ask."

Melk, about 65 kilometres down river from Mauthausen, accommodated prisoners from many nations, including Germany, Poland and Greece. In addition, it housed thousands of Hungarian Jews. The inmates worked primarily in underground factories of the German armaments industry, producing ball-bearings for tanks and aircraft. During the single year of its existence — it was established on April 20, 1944, Adolf Hitler's 55th birthday — almost 5,000 of its more than 14,000 registered inmates died of beatings, shootings and work accidents.

According to Horwitz, the residents of Melk were completely aware of the camp's function. Inmates were regularly marched through the town on the way to the camp.

Among the strongest recollections of town residents was fear, which enforced silence and obedience. Yet, Horwitz notes, townspeople believed that resistance was itself a crime, "a form of lawlessness that brought upon the perpetrator the taint of guilt and criminality."

Although collaboration with the authorities was widespread, there were acts of kindness, such as the surreptitious dropping of fruit and potatoes during prisoners' marches. In other instances, civilians even helped Jews. "Those who dared come to the aid of Jews had first to accept the humanity of the victims, seeing past the obviously repellent appearance the persecutors had forced them to assume."

In concluding, Horwitz says that the Mauthausen camp complex left no discernible impression on neighboring civilians. "...the passage of time has served to dampen whatever feelings of wrongdoing they might have sensed... One encounters not a flat denial of the existence of the camps, only an indifference..."

Interestingly enough, Jewish survivors who returned to their homes in Upper Austria after the war were not warmly welcomed. Feelings of intolerance and a lack of understanding from local authorities and citizenry greeted them.

Simon Wiesenthal, the Nazi hunter, felt this when he settled in Vienna. As he put it: "When an Austrian Jew returns he has to excuse himself, so to speak, and say 'pardon me for living' and has the greatest difficulties in receiving back what is his..."

To add to the indignity, known or suspected war criminals continued in their positions of authority.

In Austria, moral amnesia was the order of the day.

Inmates greet liberation of Mauthausen in May 1945.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Being a film aficionado, I'm drawn to Saturday Night at the Movies, Elwy Yost's long-running show on TVOntario. Recently, Yost presented Crossfire, a nearly forgotten but socially significant film made in 1947.

Nominally a police thriller, Crossfire was in fact Hollywood's first no-holds-barred treatment of anti-Semitism in the United States. Its far better known and acclaimed clone, Gentlemen's Agreement, was released shortly afterward, and won three Academy Awards.

An RKO picture starring Robert Young, Robert Mitchum and Robert Ryan, Crossfire was directed by Edward Dmytryk, produced by Adrian Scott, and adapted from a novel by Richard Brooks entitled The Brick Foxhole.

The impulse for making Crossfire came from Dmytryk and Scott, both of whom were non-Jews. The horrors of the Holocaust were still numbingly fresh, and they felt that a "message" film on anti-Semitism would be timely and appropriate.

As Patricia Erens relates in The Jew in American Cinema, they approached RKO's newly-appointed head of production, Dore Schary, who liked the idea. The original theme of The Brick Foxhole had been the murder of a homosexual. But in John Paxton's screenplay, the victim was a Jew.

Not surprisingly, some RKO executives were nervous about this substitution. Hollywood moguls, the majority of whom were Jews, traditionally avoided Jewish themes. Then the conservative American Jewish Committee (AJC) jumped into the fray, arguing that the proposed film would not be in the best interests of American Jewry. As a last resort, Dick Rothschild, an AJC representative, suggested that the victim be black instead of Jewish, according to Neal Gabler's account of Jews in Hollywood, An Empire Of Their Own.

Schary rejected these pressures, and Crossfire became a modest commercial success. The critic of the New York Times, Bosley Crowther, wrote that it deserved "an unqualified A for effort in bringing to the screen a frank and immediate demonstration of the brutality of religious bigotry."

Shot entirely at night in a typical 1940s film noir style, Crossfire opens with shadowy fisticuffs, as one man staggers to the floor and another hurriedly leaves the scene of the crime.

Significant film

Set in Washington, and unfolding in a series of flashbacks, Crossfire is a moody police procedural rather than a serious attempt to probe the roots of prejudice.

It is left to a pipe-smoking detective, Finlay (Young), to determine who murdered Samuels (Sam Levene), a bland Jewish ex-serviceman. Finlay, an Irish-American, may be jaded and cynical, but he is also dogged.

Finlay learns that several soldiers, having met Samuels in a bar, followed him back to his apartment, where the murder took place. But who is the murderer? As it turns out, the chief suspect is Montgomery (Ryan), a tense sergeant whose blatantly anti-Semitic views single him out for attention.

Montgomery is anything but subtle. He refers to Samuels as a "Jew boy;" implies that people with "funny names," like Samuels, shirked their war duty; announces that he dislikes Jews and their defenders; and charges that Jews "live off the fat of the land."

Montgomery's calumnies do not go unanswered. Kelley (Mitchum), Montgomery's fellow soldier, tellingly observes that more than a few "funny names" are inscribed on American casualty rolls, while Finlay proclaims that "ignorant men" fear that which they do not understand.

Drawing an analogy, Finlay compares the ethnocentrism and violence Irish Americans endured in the 19th century with the current Samuels murder case.

And, lest his message not be entirely clear, Finlay adds that the phenomenon of hatred is dangerously infectious and, therefore, must be vigilantly combated.

Forty-seven years on, nothing has changed in this respect. Crossfire is as relevant today as it was shortly after World War II.

Development politically motivated

By BILL HUTMAN
World Zionist Press Service

There's metropolitan New York, Paris, and even Calcutta, so why not metropolitan Jerusalem? Social and political factors in Israel's capital make such a move highly problematic. "You can't do anything in Jerusalem without prompting sharp political reactions from one group or another," says Yisrael Kimhe, a development expert from the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies. "But it's no secret that much of the development around Jerusalem has been politically motivated."

Development is scrutinized outside of Jerusalem on land acquired by Israel after Jordan attacked its eastern border during the 1967 Six Day war, land which is now part of the territories. The issue is even more sensitive in East Jerusalem, whose annexation by the Israeli government is not recognized by most of the international community.

But this has not stopped the government. Massive development in the territories adjoining Jerusalem has recently been approved by the city's planning and building committee to ensure a Jewish presence, act as a defence buffer and create "land-links" with Jerusalem.

"Past experience has proven that in order to defend Jerusalem one must have a strip of defence surrounding it to the north, south, east and west," said Deputy Defence Minister Mordechai Gur while touring Pisgat Ze'ev, a suburb in north Jerusalem, in November 1993. "We may have peace . . . but we must take into account the defence of Jerusalem and build it accordingly."

Funds are being raised, largely by wealthy American Jews who support the development, and some work is already underway in Pisgat Ze'ev, as well as in Givat Ze'ev and Ma'aleh Adumim — neighborhoods outside city limits to the north and east respectively.

Another 7,500 new homes are to be built during the next three years between Pisgat Ze'ev and Ma'aleh Adumim, thus creating a territorial link with Jerusalem. A "land-link" between the religious Etzion Bloc, in the territories to the south, and Jerusalem, however, is more problematic as Arab-populated Bethlehem, Beit Jalla, and Beit Sahur have to be bypassed. A large-scale highway and a massive tunnel under Beit Jalla are presently under construction.

The Ministry of Housing also wants to flank Jerusalem to the east with Jewish residential areas, business districts, and tourist centres.

Some ministry officials have even voiced support for creating an "Adumim Bloc" extending from the city's eastern border to Mitzpeh Jericho, just north-west of the Dead Sea. They say the bloc would meet both the development and security needs of Jerusalem, provide homes and jobs, and act as a buffer to the east. "The entire route from Jericho junction to Jerusalem is crucial to the country strategically," says Labor party MK Emmanuel Zissman, one of the main proponents of developing metropolitan Jerusalem.

The Housing Ministry spokesman, however, denies the existence of a plan to create an Adumim Bloc. But he does confirm that Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer wants to build 15,000 new homes in the Jerusalem area, about half in the territories. "We should have done what we are doing now five or six years ago in Jerusalem," says Ben-Eliezer.

Both Labor and Likud governments have pushed for western development as a solution to the capital's development needs, and last year some 14,000 dunams (3,500 acres) adjoining the city's western borders were annexed to the capital. "It's like a dream," says city engineer Elinoar Barzaki. This new land "will help take Jerusalem into the next century."

Several new neighborhoods and industrial zones are planned to begin in 1996 on the annexed land and experts are working on plans to coordinate this massive development. All, however, depends on the outcome of the peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians and the question of greater Jerusalem's boundaries.

Meanwhile, Palestinians such as Abdal Rahman Abu Arafeh, a Palestinian planner close to Palestinian leader Faisel Husseini, sharply attack the expansion plans of Israel around Jerusalem. They see the development of the lands adjoining Jerusalem as massive expropriation of Arab lands. "Since 1967, the Israelis have carried out far-reaching settlement aimed at minimizing the Arab presence [in Jerusalem] and promoting Jewish existence to the utmost," says Abu Arafeh. "It is an unjust policy. All settlements in the territories are illegal settlements because they are built on occupied land."

Zissman counters that Israel will never compromise on Jerusalem. So the building of metropolitan Jerusalem becomes only a means to an end.

BBW/T celebrates its 50th anniversary

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Women of Toronto (BBW/T) celebrated its 50th anniversary at a recent awards night.

The volunteer of the year award went to Diane Shiner-Feder for more than 700 hours of work at the Huronia Centre for the Handicapped in Orillia; Mitzi Dickstein was recognized as top fundraiser for raising $2,300.

A hundred women from 16 of the 22 BBW/T chapters were honored for their efforts in community service and fundraising during the past year. To be eligible for an award, they had to have done at least 60 hours of volunteer work or raised $750.

BBW/T president Ethy Lebow said mazel tov to all the awards recipients.

Among their activities, members of BBW/T volunteer at local organizations such as homes for the aged and hospitals. They run blood donor clinics, participate in communal drives and raise money for many causes. Each year volunteers knit mittens, hats and scarves for inner city schools as part of the mountain of mittens project. BBW/T operates an emergency shelter for battered women and their children here and a residential treatment centre for emotionally disturbed boys in Israel.

The organization looked back in time during its awards evening, held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, as speakers from the chapters formed since the '40s took the stage and spoke of their chapters' histories and accomplishments. Members of the first Toronto chapter, formed in 1944 as a ladies' auxiliary to the only B'nai Brith lodge in Toronto, attended.

The first president, 85-year-old Anne Weinstein, told The CJN that the men were enthusiastic at that time about the fledgling women's group. "We got wonderful cooperation from the men," she recalled. In the '40s and for years after, she noted, the women visited wounded soldiers in military hospitals.

One of the original 105 members of the Toronto chapter, Bea Wolfe, 77, rose to the top of BBW ranks. "I was one of those who said I'll put my name down and I won't do anything and I've been at it ever since," she told The CJN.

She became president of the 1,100-member Toronto chapter in 1954. Moving up the ladder, she went on to become president in 1962 of the board responsible for the BBW region of New York state, New England and eastern Canada. Currently she is a board member of BBW of Canada.

Wolfe credits her BBW involvement with increasing her self-confidence. "I didn't have that much self-confidence until I became president. I was empowered and doors opened. I wish the young women of today would understand that when they are asked to do something."

Viki Rumack, representing Aquarius, formed in 1970, recalled that many said the chapter "could not be successful with the startling new concept of having all ages of women join together." Aquarius volunteers and fundraisers worked together, she said, and went on to prove the skeptics wrong.

Soleil, founded in 1976 and made up entirely of French-speaking members, has the distinction of being the only French-speaking chapter outside of Quebec. The women of Soleil, said Lolita Harel, hail from Egypt, Morocco, Tunisia, Israel and France.

Younger women are making their mark on BBW/T. Representing Tikvah, started in 1960, Barbara Wiseberg said the chapter of single and married women in their twenties is developing the organization for the year 2000 and beyond.

A new chapter for single, professional women living in the downtown core is being formed.

Furman elected new JIAS president

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Robert Furman

TORONTO — Robert Furman, who came to Canada with a group of Soviet immigrants in the 1970s, is the new president of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) (Toronto).

Active in aiding his fellow immigrants for many years, Furman is also a hard worker in the chartered accountant division of the United Jewish Appeal.

His election at the society's recent annual meeting in Toronto highlights the significant number of immigrants on the JIAS board, six out of 15.

Outgoing president Gary Diamond reported 575 new cases in 1993, mostly from the former Soviet Union, involving 1,300 individuals. New federal funding will enable JIAS to expand its English as a second language program which already sponsors classes at B'nai Brith Canada and Bernard Betel Centre, he said.

As the increase of 14 per cent in Toronto's Jewish population between 1981 and 1991 is attributed mostly to immigrants, Diamond suggested that it is important to reach out to newcomers to keep them within the Jewish fold to achieve the goal of Jewish continuity.

With its 70 years of experience in the field, JIAS stands ready to share its skills with other ethnic groups, said Perry Romberg, executive director.

The Jack Shindman awards, presented by Sydney Blinick, went to Dr. Ilya Kaploun, 35, ($1,500) a former oncologist in the Soviet Union, who is beginning studies at the School of Radiation Therapy, and Nika Berdichevskaya, 20, ($1,000) a visual arts student at the University of Toronto. There were 34 applications for the awards.

Four performing arts scholarships endowed by the late John Hirsch, director of the Stratford Festival, an immigrant himself, went to Igor Gefter, a cellist; Marina Zelter, a violinist; Galina Zisk of Hamilton, a pianist; and Ilona Karan of Hamilton, an opera singer who has been offered admission to three different universities.

Two national education scholarships were awarded to Natalia Skomorovskaia, a former Russian pediatrician, who has enrolled for a nursing degree at Centennial College, and Anna Rozenberg, 19, a young Russian woman who is enrolled in physiotherapy at the University of Toronto.

Shaar Shalom gets new rabbi

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Martin Berman doesn't mind being the new rabbi on the block.

Rabbi Berman, who takes over the pulpit of the Conservative Shaar Shalom Synagogue on July 18, said he isn't nervous about facing his new congregation.

"Maybe if it was my first pulpit," he laughed from his Detroit-area home.

Rabbi Berman, 44, has been spiritual leader of the 440-family Congregation Beth Achim in Southfield, Mich, since 1989.

He will be replacing Shaar Shalom's current rabbi, Rabbi Howard Markose, who is leaving the 600-family synagogue after six years. Rabbi Markose is making aliyah with wife Judy and their three children.

"I've had nothing but complete satisfaction [at Shaar Shalom]," Rabbi Markose told The CJN. "But aliyah means 'ascent' and we are looking forward to ascending to the next spiritual level, both for ourselves and for our children."

The Markoses — including Noam, 7, Eran, 4, and 2-year-old Leor — will make their home in the Jerusalem neighborhood of East Talpiot. Rabbi Markose said he will likely teach.

For Rabbi Berman, leading the Thornhill congregation is "a very exciting proposition. It is a wonderful community in a vibrant area, with good growth opportunities."

Rabbi Martin Berman

He is coming to Toronto with wife Marylin, a nursery school teacher, and two of their three children. The oldest, 17-year-old Etan, is staying behind to finish school, while Tamar, 15, and Ari, 13, will attend the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Associated Hebrew Day Schools respectively.

Mark Hammerschlag, the synagogue president who led the 12-member committee to find Rabbi Markose's replacement, said "in the end it was an easy decision.

"Rabbi Berman's was the first resume we saw, and we kept coming back to him. There was a real comfort level."

As for Rabbi Markose, Hammerschlag said "it's not easy giving [him] up, but you can't stand in his way. We respect what he's doing."

Rabbi Berman will officiate at his first Shaar Shalom bar mitzvah July 23.

Peacekeepers honored as Reena marks 20 years

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Reena is the Hebrew word for joy, which was in no small measure at last week's Reena Foundation annual dinner.

This year's gala took on even more significance, as Reena marked its 20th anniversary of helping developmentally disabled adults integrate into the mainstream community through group living and day programs, all in a Jewish environment.

Over 700 Reena volunteers, staff, clients and friends joined municipal dignitaries for the glitzy dinner, which this year took on a timely twist: instead of a single honoree, Reena paid tribute to 10 Canadian soldiers who served as peacekeepers in Bosnia.

The soldiers — nine men and one woman — were honored for helping save over 100 patients in two hospitals that were abandoned late last year in the small central Bosnian town of Fojnica.

The peacekeepers discovered the patients, many of them developmentally disabled children, starving, freezing, soiled and left to die by retreating Bosnian fighters.

The Canadians fed the youngsters, changed diapers and delivered coal, medicine and supplies for two months until the Red Cross took over. They also buried the dead.

The soldiers, stationed in Val Cartier, Que., are members of the 12th Canadian Armored Battalion, the 1st and 2nd Royal 22nd Regiment, the 5th Field Ambulance and the 5th Light Artillery Regiment. They received a standing ovation following a tribute from former Reena chair Marilyn Raphael.

Earlier that day, the soldiers visited a Reena group home and day program.

Reena's Tammy Gutstein Humanitarian Award, named for a late volunteer, was presented posthumously to Sam Handler, a longtime volunteer. Handler died June 3, less than three weeks before the dinner.

Reena's founding chair, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, presented the award to Handler's widow, Helen, who described Reena "as the only mistress Sam ever had."

Thanks also came from Sam Handler's grandson, Dan Kennedy.

Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson brought greetings on behalf of her municipality, where construction is expected to begin later this summer on Reena's $7.5 million Toby and Henry Battle Development Centre.

The Clark Avenue centre will house day programs, a creative arts studio, kosher kitchen and drop-in activities for people with developmental disabilities.

Reena chair Hy Eiley touched on the organization's plans for restructuring. Those include more and earlier consulting with families, longer-range planning and eliminating Reena's long waiting list.

Dinner co-chairs Marshall Gottlieb and Ron Hoffman took the audience through a mini-history of Reena, which opened its first group home in 1975. Three years later, government funding came through and Reena was off and running.

Today, the organization provides services for over 300 adults and runs 22 group homes throughout Metro.

Teens prepare for Israel trip

PARRY SOUND, Ont. — Jewish teens from small Ontario communities toured an ulpan, a kibbutz, the Western Wall, an absorption centre, and a cafe on Dizengoff Street in Tel Aviv this month with passports in hand.

However, you usually don't need a passport to get to Maple Lake Lodge in Parry Sound, Ont.

The 28 teens were preparing for an upcoming five-week Israel trip as part of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, High School Outreach Program.

At the make-believe ulpan checkpoint, Congress executive member Reva Sober dispensed some handy Hebrew phrases. Senior educational consultant Gary Levine served drinks and discussed Israeli politics in his role as a Dizengoff cafe owner.

Volunteer Devorah Levine, as director of an absorption centre, related some of the difficulties encountered by newcomers to Israel. Gary Levine switched roles to portray an observant Jew at the Western Wall discussing Judiasm.

Following her Israel trip on the lodge's grounds, 17-year-old Caterina Carpino of Sudbury said "I am looking forward to the real thing when we journey to Israel in July."

She said during the past year she learned a lot about Judaism and Israel. "As a result of my participation [in the outreach program], I now better appreciate my Jewish heritage, and Israel as our homeland."

Congress is committed to preserving and strengthening Jewish life throughout the province's smaller Jewish centres. The High School Outreach Program enables teens to bond with others with similar experiences.

The program runs on a three-year cycle providing comprehensive education about Judaism. Instruction is provided by CJC staff through home visits, community meetings and mailings. Each year, participants come together for two kallot featuring educational and recreational programs.

During the third year, attention is focused on Israel's past, present and future in preparation for the five-week Israeli summer experience. While in Israel, the teenagers study Hebrew, work on a kibbutz, spend time in the army, experience Shabbat, and tour the country.

Amy Malowitz, 17, of Windsor said her involvement in the program was an opportunity for her "to get connected" for the first time with Canadian Jewish teenagers. Most of her friends reside across the border in Detroit.

Randie Cartman, who had taken part in the CJC program as a participant and later a volunteer, was introduced as the program's new coordinator. A native of Montreal who grew up in Sudbury, Cartman is a York University graduate who worked as coordinator of Congress' regional Summer Camp Program in 1992.

More information about the next cycle of the program beginning in September can be obtained by contacting Susan Jackson or Randie Cartman at (416) 635-2883.

Bible study getting short shrift

By PHIL FINE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The five books of Moses get star billing in Jewish elementary schools but short shrift in yeshivot and adult study groups.

That's the message a university academic gave a shul audience here recently.

Dr. Martin Lockshin, professor of Jewish studies at York University, told a capacity crowd at Adath Israel Synagogue that Bible study may still be central to Jewish education — but it is studied only in the elementary grades.

"In most classical Jewish circles, adults are not getting stimulation out of the five books of Moses but out of the Talmud," Lockshin said.

Indeed, in the yeshiva world, he noted, the Chumash has become an object of veneration, not of study. Moreover, "Torah" itself has come to mean Mishna, Talmud and their many accumulated layers of commentary.

"We have so much Judaism which has been built up over the years that the Torah itself does not have the centrality it once had," Lockshin told his listeners.

Lockshin recalled that during his own yeshiva days, he and his study partner would get strange looks from other students for devoting time to the study of Bible.

Why the apparent decline in Bible study?

Religious competition is one reason, he said. The rise of Christianity forced Judaism to emphasize those things — Mishna, Talmud — which made Jewish belief different, Lockshin said.

Lockshin also noted that Rashi, who wrote the definitive commentary on the Chumash, had himself called for less emphasis on Bible and more emphasis on Talmud.

"Rashi was suggesting children's time would be better spent studying Jewish texts other than the Bible."

Turning to Jewish unity, Lockshin said the many splinter movements in Judaism today present less of a threat to Jewish survival than the apathy of Jews themselves.

"The real crisis is the vast number of Jews in the world for whom the fact they are Jewish is a matter of indifference," Lockshin noted.

"The fact they are Jewish is something like the fact they are, say, a brunette."

Judaism, Lockshin continued, has always managed to rid itself of negative elements and would not fail to do the same with splinter groups which threaten it today.

Indeed, over the centuries, he pointed out, such splinter groups as the Essenes, the Sadducees and the Samaritans had come and gone.

In reply to one questioner, Lockshin said Judaism's purpose was to engage the intellect — not leave the individual with a smattering of good feelings.

BBC vice-president meets with eastern European Jews

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — During a recent two-week, three country tour of the Czech Republic, Poland and Hungary, Lyle Smordin, senior vice-president, B'nai Brith Canada, said he was pleased to see Polish students starting to visit Auschwitz.

Although Smordin wasn't there in an official B'nai Brith capacity, he and his wife Evita did meet with the executive director of the Czech Jewish Federation and spoke to a B'nai Brith lodge in Budapest.

Budapest, he reports, still has a Jewish population of 20,000-30,000. However, he describes the community as "cautious and fearful" despite conditions much improved over what they were under the Communist regime.

"They are reticent in dealing with government," he said. "They are worried about what the change in government will bring. (The first democratically elected government, a right-wing group with some anti-Semitic members, was recently beaten by the rejuvenated former Communists.) My sense is that many of them are interested in leaving with America or Canada rather than Israel their preferred destination. I think though that most will stay as long as there is no persecution although their numbers will continue to decline through attrition."

In Poland, the Smordins visited Krakow and the remains of its once thriving Jewish community — one synagogue and a state-operated museum in the old Jewish quarter.

First visit

While this was his first visit to Auschwitz, Evita, a Holocaust teacher at Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, had been there earlier in 1979. At that time, it was not organized. There were no descriptions or explanations. Now there are a lot of explanations and the brick buildings are each named for one of the many nations, including the Jewish people, whose members perished in the Holocaust, he said.

Smordin points out that Auschwitz was the holding camp for nearby Birkenau where the crematoria were. He reports there is little left of Birkenau. Poles for years came and removed the bricks for their own building needs.

In Prague, the capital of the Czech Republic, the Smordins found an officially registered Jewish community of 1,300 although the true number may be about 3,000. Smordin reports that the government is currently in the process of turning over ownership of the Jewish communal buildings to the community. With the exception of the Altneuschul, all were officially owned by the government. The community members had the same right of access to them as foreign tourists.

While in Prague, the Smordins were able to renew acquaintances with Boruch Rand, the first superintendent of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education when it was formed in 1980. Rand now divides his time between Toronto and Prague organizing joint ventures between Canada and the Czech Republic.

In general, the Smordins found the synagogue and Jewish organizations they visited in Budapest and Prague populated mainly by older people. "It isn't so different than what we see in Canada," he said.

Hampson speaks out on breast cancer

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 51, Sharon Hampson is the picture of vitality and style. As keynote speaker at a recent symposium on breast cancer, Hampson took the podium dressed in a sunny yellow blazer, flowing asymmetrically-hemmed skirt and black lace-up boots. Her frequent smile belied the nervousness she said she felt at her still unfamiliar speaking role. (She spoke publicly about the disease for the first time only last November.)

Hampson, who makes up one-third of the children's trio Sharon, Lois and Bram, was at Beth Shalom Synagogue to speak about her six-year experience as a breast cancer patient. The forum, entitled Breast Cancer — The Up Side, was co-sponsored by Toronto Hadassah-WIZO and the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

Hampson was joined by panelists Dr. Roy Clark, radiation oncologist; Dr. John Semple, plastic reconstructive surgeon; and Mary Cousins, research dietician.

Moderator for the evening was Monica Wright-Roberts, breast cancer survivor and author of Side by Side, a booklet which details specific ways in which friends and family can help cancer patients. (The publication is available through the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.)

Clark began the evening on a positive note by commenting on the number of healthy-looking patients he saw in the audience, some of whom he had first treated over 20 years ago.

"If you're going to get cancer, this is one of the better ones to get," he said.

It has been estimated that in Canada in 1993 about 16,300 women developed breast cancer and 5,400 women died of the disease, Clark said. Breast cancer is the leading killer of women between the ages of 35 and 55, he noted.

An increase in the incidence of breast cancer of 1.5 per cent per year over the past decade may be partly due to better screening and earlier diagnosis, he said. The latter has led to an 87 per cent survival rate after five years, he added.

Clark urged women over 50 to be screened at an Ontario Breast Screening Program centre. There is no charge for the service and a doctor's referral is not necessary.

Standard treatment has changed in recent years, Clark said. Lumpectomy and irradiation confined to the breast have become the preferred treatments for most women with localized breast cancer, he explained.

Semple, the plastic reconstructive surgeon, noted that there are still a number of women who have mastectomies. Breast reconstruction is an option for them, he said, adding that "we don't try and push it on anybody."

The most common method of breast reconstruction — albeit not suitable for all patients — involves using the patient's own abdominal tissue, Semple said. Other methods include implants, but not controversial silicone gel implants, which have been banned in Canada.

Many patients have breast reconstruction at the same time as their mastectomy, said Semple. Women can thus "go to sleep with a breast and wake up with a breast," although nipple reconstruction is done at a later date.

He stressed that "although we can reconstruct a reasonable facsimile of a breast, it should by no means make breast cancer more acceptable."

Because a high-fat diet is suspected as a breast cancer risk factor, Cousins explained how to follow Canada's Food Guide, which was revised in 1992 to reflect the changing needs of Canadians.

The easiest way to calculate the proper proportions for a meal, said Cousins, is to remember that when you're looking at your plate, two-thirds of the food should consist of starch, grains, fruit and vegetables. One-third can be made up of protein, and added fat should be limited, she said.

She advised keeping a record of food intake to determine the sources of fat in your diet. "It's the most powerful tool nutritionists suggest," she said.

Risky habits, particularly for women, include "eating a meal while preparing a meal," and eating a large meal shortly before bedtime.

Although Hampson didn't fall into a high-risk category, she was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1988 and underwent a lumpectomy. A recurrence in February 1993 necessitated a second lumpectomy, a course of radiation and treatment with tamoxifen pills. According to Canadian statistics, 70 per cent of women developing breast cancer have no risk factors.

"This happens to other people," Hampson remembers thinking.

The most difficult part of her ordeal was [the thought of] telling her parents and children, she said. A friend of hers suggested that she let her husband tell their children and let her sister tell their parents in order to "let them have a chance to have their reactions without controlling their emotions for your benefit.

"What I needed was really positive vibes," she said.

Hampson's work played an important role in her recovery. "In many ways work was my salvation, and luckily for me, people clap for me when I do it," she said. "Clap for people who are down," she urged. "It's restorative."

Hampson's experience with breast cancer taught her that she must act as her own advocate, she said. "I believe it's crucial for us to inform ourselves about our options," she said.

One of her most difficult lessons was "recognizing the need to take care of myself." In order to balance treatment, emotional strain, home, family and workload, "it's important to recognize our own needs and express them," she said.

"I know I am fortunate," says Hampson.

About People

REENA AWARD WINNERS

Two Torontonians with a developmental handicap received special honors from Reena. Phil Lepofsky and Paul Cantlie each received the Employee of the Year Award at Reena's recent annual general meeting held at Baycrest Terrace/Wagman Centre. They were honored for contributions made to their individual employers — Lepofsky for his six-year commitment to Mr. Leonard, a women's apparel manufacturer, and Cantlie to the Canadian Tire store at Lawrence Square. This is the 10th year that Reena has honored clients with this award. To date more than 18 men and women have received the award.

AJL OFFICERS

At its recent annual meeting, the Association of Jewish Libraries (AJL) elected Edmond Y. Lipsitz as its president. Other officers elected were Rachel Fain, vice-president; Rabbi Zigmund Wolkenstein, immediate past president; Barry Walfish, national AJL liaison; Bernard Katz, treasurer; Carol Payne, secretary; Joseph Berkovits, membership; Beverley Birkan, Rosemary Cohen and Zina Glassman, program; Lynn Pasternak, publicity and public relations.

At the meeting, Walfish, from the University of Toronto Libraries, gave a talk on The Resurrection of a Library-History on the Judaica Collection of the Ukraine, based on his recent trip to Russia and Kiev.

HUMANITARIAN AWARD

Wendy Kline, a resident of Toronto and a second-year student of Yeshiva University's Wurzweiler School of Social Work in New York City, has received the 1994 Humanitarian Award from Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children. The award is given to recognize and honor students working at the hospital who have consistently demonstrated compassion and humanitarianism to children and their families. Kline, who is enrolled in Wurzweiler's Block Plan which allows students to complete degree requirements for the master of social work degree in three summers of study in New York City while working for social service agencies during the academic year, has done her field placement in the hospital's cardiac program since September 1993.

PLENARY ASSEMBLY APPOINTMENT

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Irving Abella has announced the appointment of Goldie Hershon as chair of the 1995 National Plenary Assembly to be held at the Bonaventure Hilton Hotel in Montreal, May 14-15.

Hershon is presently a CJC national vice-president and a member of the Quebec region executive, officers and community relations committees. Most recently she co-chaired the CJC 75th anniversary committee. In 1989 she became the first woman to serve as chair of the Quebec region. She has been active in Soviet Jewry lobbying efforts, a member of the Federation CJA board of trustees, co-chair for the 1989 Combined Jewish Appeal Super Sunday, a recipient of the CJA Chairman's Award, and a member of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal.

The Plenary steering committe has already begun meeting. Sharon Wolfe will serve as programming chair.

USDS EXECUTIVE

At its recent annual corporation meeting, United Synagogue Day School elected the following executive committee members — Eileen Silver, president; David Engel, executive vice-president; Geoffrey Bledin, Jill Reitman and Renee Schachter, vice-presidents; Kathryn Cooper, secretary; Sheldon Gold, treasurer. Ira Schecter is immediate past president. USDS, is housed in three campuses, under the leadership of Solomon Kaplanski, its director of education, and Steven Hacker, administrator.

OUTSTANDING GYMNAST

Local teenager Justin Maurice Gerson placed second of 31 of Canada's top gymnasts at the Canadian National Championships held in Prince Edward Island recently and has been appointed to his age group's National Team which will be competing in the forthcoming Commonwealth Games. In 1993 the 16-year-old won both a gold and bronze medal at the Maccabi games in Israel.

Justin was born in Johannesburg, South Africa and arrived in Toronto with his family in 1980 at the age of two.

Golf tourney inspired by heart condition

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Of the six guys on the executive organizing committee, only one is named Moe and the song and dance they do hasn't yet made it to Broadway. But the six friends not all named Moe have found their own claim to fame.

Together they have parlayed their interest in cardiac research into a highly successful summertime fundraising event.

Jeff "Moe" Morrison, and the Moe wannabees — Alan Bloch, Cary Green, Maurice Kagan, Jack Szymkowicz and Brett Tkatch — are the men behind this year's fourth annual Moe Classic golf tournament/extravaganza that raises thousands for heart research.

This year's tournament, which has all the earmarks of the most successful yet, is scheduled for July 7 at the Aurora Highlands Golf Club. Weeks in advance of the starting date, the tournament/fundraiser was fully subscribed with 152 participants and another 100 hopefuls on a waiting list. In addition, 200 corporate sponsors — from A & P Stores to Woodley's Jewellers — have signed on for this year's Classic.

With each golfer expected to ante up $125 as well as sell a book of raffle tickets worth $150, organizers expect to raise more than $50,000 to benefit pediatric cardiac research through the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario.

In 1992, its first year of existence, the Classic raised a modest $8,200, but that jumped to $33,000 last year, exceeding organizers' expectations of $25,000.

This year, interest was so high that "it was like a Barbra Streisand ticket," said Morrison.

Advertised mostly through word of mouth, the event has grown in large measure because "there is not one nickel of overhead," Green said.

Corporate sponsors provide a wealth of prizes and specialty services like printing, as well as food and beverages, Morrison said.

Perhaps the most enticing aspect of the event is the warm feeling and welcoming attitude at the Classic, said Kagan.

The idea for the tournament originated with Morrison several years ago.

"I had a heart attack when I was 30 and a second when I was 33. At 34 I had quadruple bypass surgery."

While Morrison was lying in a hospital bed recovering from his ailments, down the hall Ester Kagan, Maurice's wife, was undergoing her own cardiac crisis. After she gave birth to daughter Danielle, now 3½, doctors discovered an aortic aneurism that proves fatal in 95 per cent of cases when it's untreated as long as hers was, she said.

Ester underwent successful open-heart surgery and now "my surgeon can't believe I'm alive. . . My doctor said I'm a walking miracle."

The Kagans' interest in heart research was given a further impetus two years later when, during a routine physical, Danielle was found to have a heart murmur. Employing a unique surgical technique, doctors at the Hospital for Sick Children repaired a tiny hole in her heart and Danielle is now an active, energetic child.

Morrison recalls that, "When I got out of hospital, I was amazed that I was out of pocket only $3 and I felt I wanted to give something back."

In addition, Morrison said, "I didn't want anyone to have to go through what I did at 34."

With the assistance of the six-man executive committee — friends who stood by him during his illness — he invited 23 people to the first Moe Classic. Through word of mouth and because of the excellent reputation the tournament has garnered, the Classic has continued to grow.

This year, organizers introduced a Mini-Moe Classic, a miniature golf event that attracted 275 children and raised $3,000.

Women urged to study halachic process in depth

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritime Correspondent

HALIFAX — There is no reason that the same intellectual advances that women have found in the larger society, cannot also take place in the spiritual realm, a noted American teacher and writer said recently in Halifax.

Speaking in an interview after appearing at a scholar-in-residence weekend for the Beth Israel Synagogue, Tamar Frankiel strongly urged women to form classes and study groups to better their understanding of the halachic process.

Frankiel, a professor in history of western religion at Claremont School of Theology in California, spent three days in Halifax, addressing issues in Orthodox Judaism such as learning, prayer and relations between men and women.

Frankiel, who also spoke at the Sunday installation of Rabbi Shlomo Grafstein as spiritual leader of Beth Israel Synagogue, holds a PhD in History of Religion from University of Chicago. She has taught comparative religion and American religious history at Stanford University, Princeton, San Diego State, University of California at Berkeley and the University of Judaism.

Jayson Greenblatt, a past president of Beth Israel, said Frankiel showed women the idea that many of their restrictions did not come from God, but from men. "She suggested we could chip away at those feelings and set some loosening in the framework. And she emphasized that questioning is not forbidden."

Frankiel said women have the same obligation to pray twice a day as men and an obligation to understand. "You can certainly do as much as you can, can increase your sense of gratitude and joy and develop a closeness to God."

She emphasized women "could pray privately or let public davening assist you in carrying you forward in your prayer."

Frankiel said the dynamics between men and women are an important element of Judaism, and are basic to family and morality. Differences between men and women should be celebrated, she said.

"The general Judaic focus for women is the inward dimension of strengthening home and family, the foundation of Jewish life. The focus for men is the synagogue."

She considers herself a feminist. "I will assert that women should have a clear voice in what affects them."

She encouraged the congregation to support Rabbi Grafstein in his new job, "which is not an easy one. We all have the treasure box of Torah which can reveal so much to us. When you are not sure how to access that treasure box, the rabbi can solve problems in so many ways through Torah."

Rabbi Grafstein said his responsibility is to teach, enlighten and inspire.

Rosh yeshiva Rabbi David says goodbye to Toronto

By PHIL FINE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For Rabbi Avishai David, it's a bittersweet time.

The 44-year-old New York City native is leaving the two Toronto schools — Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot — which he has guided as rosh yeshiva for the past nine years.

But then again he's leaving to take up two new teaching jobs in Israel.

"I obviously have mixed emotions," he told a reporter during a farewell dinner at North York's Clanton Park Synagogue.

"But I feel a lot was accomplished in terms of connecting with students and exposing them to Torah. And the fact that we're making aliyah is obviously an exciting and challenging venture."

In Israel, Rabbi David will be teaching at Or Etzion, a hesder yeshiva in Mercaz Shapira, and at Michlalah, a girls school in Jerusalem.

At the Clanton Park dinner, students, staff and parents heaped praises upon Rabbi David for both his scholarship and the example he set for students.

Typical of the comments were those of Rabbi David Aronson, chair of the Or Chaim-Ulpanat Orot education committee.

"They learned Torah from him but more so, they absorbed the values of a committed Talmud chacham," said Aronson of Rabbi David's influence on his students.

"They learned education has value and illiteracy is not piety, and that both Eretz Israel and Medinat Israel have meaning for religious Jews."

Rafael Lipner, an Or Chaim graduate, praised what he said was Rabbi David's openness and approachability.

Lipner, who is now studying in New York, said he never failed to call on Rabbi David on visits to Toronto.

"Rabbi David, you have this aura about you — a.k.a. the or HaTorah," Lipner quipped.

Rabbi Moshe Stern, chair of the Vaad Harabanim of Ontario, said Rabbi David contributed to discussions of halachic matters.

"I feel with the departure of Rabbi David's mishpachah there will be a void and a vacuum in the community because he has made a valuable contribution to all that is good and right," Rabbi Stern said.

At evening's end, it was Rabbi David's turn to go to the podium.

"Baruch Hashem, the dream of aliyah is one I have had for many years and, B'ezrat Hashem, one I hope to realize," the bearded rosh yeshiva told his listeners.

Speaking in his characteristic quick fashion, Rabbi David praised both his colleagues and the Or Chaim-Ulpanat Orot administrative staff. He singled out students as well, saying they had been largely responsible for the schools' success.

Rabbi David also thanked the many guests who had turned out to honor both himself and his wife.

"I am grateful for all of you who have graced us with your presence," he said, visibly moved. "We have made many friends in this community."

The dinner was also an occasion to bid farewell to Rabbi Moshe Rachimi, who is returning to Israel after a five-year stint as principal of Ulpanat Orot.

"I am sure our kesher with Rabbi Rachimi will continue for many years to come," Dr. Yehudi Shields, an Ulpanat Orot board member, said at the beginning of the evening.

Rabbi Rachimi told the dinner that as principal he had striven to give students a deep understanding of both Torah and the secular sciences.

"The ultimate goal is to have a Jewish young man or woman live in the Jewish world with pride and in the secular world with dignity," Rabbi Rachimi said of the Or Chaim-Ulpanat educational philosophy.

Detroit native to teach Yiddish at U of T as Ray Wolfe Fellow

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After singing in a 1981 community theatre production of They Fought Back, a play about Jewish resistance during the Holocaust, Ellen Kellman was inspired to take an intensive summer course in Yiddish at the YIVO Institute in New York.

"That was the beginning of a major commitment for me," she told The CJN during a recent interview in Toronto. Kellman was in town to arrange accommodation for the coming academic year, when she will be affiliated with the University of Toronto's Jewish Studies program as the 1994-95 Ray D. Wolfe Fellow. She will be teaching Yiddish language, literature and culture.

A native of Detroit, Kellman was working as an instructor of English as a Second Language in Seattle, Washington when her interest in Yiddish was sparked anew. Both her mother and her late father were native speakers of the language, having been born in White Russia.

Kellman's mother, Rebecca Oppenheim, was raised in London, Ontario, after immigrating as a child. As a young woman, she worked for the Detroit branch of the Yiddish newspaper, the Forverts. "She has sort of a passion for Yiddish. I think I picked up some of that from her," says Kellman.

Kellman's formal Yiddish education began at Detroit's Sholom

Ellen Kellman

Aleichem Institute, where she attended classes three times a week. She maintained a tenuous connection with the language as a young adult through her singing.

Kellman left Seattle in 1985 to pursue graduate studies in Yiddish at Columbia University in New York, and is currently working on her doctoral thesis on Popular Novels in the American Yiddish Press: 1900-1940. A self-confessed "language junkie," she has also studied Hebrew, German, French and Russian, and has been teaching Yiddish since 1987, most recently at Columbia University and the YIVO Institute.

"My Jewish identity starts with Yiddish," said Kellman.

The oldest existing Yiddish literature dates back to the 16th century, Kellman said. She noted, however, that its heyday as a modern literature was in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

"There is a great need for translators," said Kellman. "There's a vast literature that's totally untranslated, and a lot of material that wasn't translated so well needs to be retranslated."

Kellman mentioned that an anthology of stories by Yiddish women writers will be published in Toronto later this year. The book, entitled Found Treasures, includes never-before-translated short fiction and autobiography from the past century. Of the 20 writers, Kellman was familiar with the work of only about half a dozen, although she has studied Yiddish literature extensively. "That gives you a sense of all the material that has never been translated, and it is very worthwhile material," she said.

Kellman believes that Yiddish has a future as a spoken language. "It's alive in the ultra-Orthodox culture, and I think it will continue to flourish with them." She also noted that there are small groups of people in many countries who continue to speak Yiddish on a regular basis.

The recent resurgence of klezmer music has resulted in new songs being written in Yiddish, she added. "There's definitely a growing interest in the language."

Soberman's students pay tribute to mentor

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A portrait of dedication and caring emerged at a recent tribute service held in memory of Susan Soberman at the North York Board of Education building.

Soberman, a high school teacher and active volunteer in the Jewish community, died in April of a heart attack at the age of 48. Friends and colleagues organized the service, at which a dozen speakers shared their memories of Soberman and the impact she had made.

Some of the most poignant tributes came from former students, who were inspired as much by her work in the classroom as by the voluntary work with which she filled her free time.

Talia Klement, a student at York Mills Collegiate, received her "first real education on the Holocaust" from Soberman. Known as a pioneer in Holocaust education in North York, Soberman was an active member of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, of which she was a founding member, and of the Holocaust education committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"She instilled in us the necessity of hard work and dedication, two things I will carry with me forever," said Klement. "She was adamant about learning for the sake of learning rather than for the marks. She was more than a teacher. She was an adviser, a confidante, a mentor and a friend."

"Susan was no phony," said Rosalie Blond, head of the English as a Second Language (ESL) department at York Mills. "She cared very deeply for her students. Some of the kids loved her and some didn't, but they all learned from her."

Reuven Jhriad, a former student and family practice resident who has become involved with inner city medicine, attributes his career focus to Soberman's influence and example. He first knew her as his teacher at Sir Sandford Fleming Secondary School almost a decade ago, when he took a course about the Holocaust.

At the time of Soberman's death, she had been teaching for almost 25 years. Among the courses she taught were English, Dramatic Arts, and ESL.

Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, remembers Soberman as "sensitive, emotional and intense." The two women became close friends when they roomed together on the League's Holocaust and Hope study tour for educators in Germany, Poland and Israel.

Soberman later chaired the Holocaust and Hope educators' committee, a task for which she was well suited because of her "passion and commitment," Mock said.

"Susan stood for the eradication of hatred, bigotry and racism, and the hope for a safer and more tolerant world," said Elsa Chandler, North York Board of Education trustee.

Frank Bialystock, former chair of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust education sub-committee, said that Soberman "just wanted to do the work" rather than "grabbing the headlines."

"I came to understand that what drove Susan was a real commitment to human rights," Bialystock said.

"Her greatest legacy was the inspiration she fostered [in people] to get involved and not be a bystander," said former student Cathy Himelfarb, past president of the now-defunct Canadian Association for Ethiopian Jewry (CAEJ).

Soberman spent her summer vacations for the past decade teaching English to Ethiopian olim in Israel as a volunteer. She never went to Israel empty-handed, but took clothing, books and other supplies for the Ethiopian olim, noted Evelyne Keslassy, a member of the Ethiopian Jewry subcommittee of Canadian Jewish Congress. "Her goal for them was full integration with dignity, not just their physical needs."

Aside from her career and community work, Soberman's eclectic interests included Hollywood celebrities, prominent Jewish personalities, fine art, travel and family, said longtime friend Roz Lofsky. (Soberman is survived by her parents, Tillie and Cantor Morris Soberman, and her brother Allan.)

Soberman was "a very caring friend," said Lofsky. "No topic was too large or too small for Susan [to discuss]."

Peter Silverman, Canadian Society for Yad Vashem; John Ip, vice-principal, York Mills Collegiate; and Danielle Stein, a student at York Mills, also paid tribute to Soberman.

FORMER SOVIET DISSIDENT VISITS

Over 100 young Jewish leaders were at Governors Hill to hear an impassioned address by former Soviet dissident Leonid Feldman at the recent New Leadership State of Israel Bonds event entitled From Marx to Moses: One Man's Remarkable Odyssey. Rabbi Feldman, the first Soviet born Conservative rabbi, emphasized his recent experience on this year's March of the Living. Seen (from right) Dr. Howard Alter, New Leadership co-chair; Brenda Bloomstone, event chair; Rabbi Feldman; and Jordana Enig Stockhamer, New Leadership co-chair.

Teaching Judaism to Children

TORONTO — The great tragedy for the Jewish community in the latter part of the 20th century is the belief that Judaism can be transmitted through osmosis, says an American rabbi and teacher at University of Judaism in Los Angeles.

"The truth is, nothing substitutes for Judaism," said Rabbi David Wolpe. "Being charitable is not enough to preserve Judaism and building Holocaust museums is not enough to preserve Judaism."

Rabbi Wolpe, author of Teaching Your Children About G-d, was guest speaker at the recent Harry Posen Memorial Lecture and Siyum presented by the Institute for Jewish Learning. The evening was held in celebration of the end of the year of studies as well as the graduation of its inaugural chevra class.

He said parents are inclined to change the subject when their children talk about G-d. "Talking about G-d is more intimate than talking about sex, because when you talk about G-d we are talking about the stuff at the bottom of our souls and we like to keep our souls closed. Children deserve better than that."

Rabbi Wolpe conceded that talking about G-d is difficult and people often do not know what to say. "[G-d] is a lot like love — something greater than you that you can feel. You do not need to know answers though, you only need to open up and share on a level with children that is very deep."

CJC Western Conference

VANCOUVER — To mark the 75th anniversary of Canadian Jewish Congress, the Pacific region will host its first-ever Western conference Oct 22-23.

The conference will be funded in part by a grant from Multiculturalism B.C. A cheque for $5,000 has already been presented to regional chair Renee Switzer Bellas by Vancouver MLA Bernie Simpson. Other funding will come from the endowment fund of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

The theme of the conference will be And Justice For All. A variety of social justice and public policy issues, human rights and inter-ethnic issues will be addressed.

Speakers will represent senior levels of government, leaders of ethnic and religious communities and academia.

Women's Bonds Luncheon

TORONTO — A prominent Holocaust survivor recently left many Israel Bonds supporters in tears as she recounted her story of survival.

Chris Lerman, whose husband Miles is chair of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, described a personal chronology of horror for the Toronto Women's Division of State of Israel Bonds, at a luncheon held at the home of Roma Buchman.

Lerman spoke of the "sacred obligation" required of all those who were listening, to "make sure Israel is economically and militarily strong" by purchasing Bonds.

Teen Equestrian Top Jewish Athlete

WINNIPEG — Sixteen-year-old equestrian Shashawna Greenberg was awarded the Max M. Nusgart Memorial Award as the 1994 Manitoba Jewish Athlete of the Year at the recent 22nd annual YMHA Jewish Community Centre of Winnipeg Sports Dinner.

Greenberg, who is entering Grade 11 at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in September, began riding when she was seven and her mother put her on a horse. She has been competing since she was nine. Last year, she won the Winnipeg Horseman's Trophy and the Canadian Equestrian Trophy. She also won the overall Canadian Equestrian Federation junior amateur competition and was reserve champion in the junior hunter division.

In both cases, she was competing against riders who were older and more experienced. At the 1994 Brandon Winter Fair, she won four more titles competing against some of Western Canada's best riders.

One of the highlights of the dinner was a tribute to Sherman Greenfeld, Canada's top racquetball player.

Entertaining Seniors

TORONTO — Shula Robin is a super professional and a super volunteer.

For many years, Robin has successfully coordinated benefit concerts for Ezrath Nashim Hospital in Jerusalem. Now she has turned her efforts to entertaining seniors with her academic poetry and stories.

Until recently, no one outside her family knew that Robin is a talented poet and writer. But the founder of Robin's Artists Management received the Editor's Choice Award for Outstanding Achievement in Poetry from the National Library of Poetry in Owings Mills, Md.

Her poems have been published in Canadian and American anthologies as well as in magazines and newspapers. A manuscript of her poems has been submitted to a publisher.

Robin has teamed up with Gladys Aaron to present dramatic poetry readings at public libraries, senior residences and at private gatherings. They have presented programs at the Lifestyle Senior Residences and the Wagman Centre.

At the Holocaust Commemoration Program at the Beth Sholom Synagogue, Robin read some of her poetry and a short story about her family and the Jews of Poland. And at the Yom Hashoah program at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Congress, Jeff Wener recited her poem Why, Oh God, Why?

Robin said her free flowing poetry deals with contemporary issues, her Jewish heritage and timeless subjects including love and romance, aging and family relations.

CHAT's Top Athletes

TORONTO — Daniel Bar-Dayan and Dena Weinroth were named athletes of the year at the recent fourth Annual CHAT Awards Ceremony.

The two Grade 12 students were recognized for their athletic accomplishments in a number of major interschool sports, said Lil Fox, co-ordinator of the school's athletic department.

Weinroth participated in girls basketball, volleyball and softball for four years and was the basketball team's MVP all four seasons, Fox said.

Bar-Dayan has been a mainstay of the basketball team for four years, being named MVP of the senior squad this year. He's also a member of the tennis and softball team and he plays intramural volleyball as well, Fox said.

CHAT's physical education department also recognized the talents of two Grade 12 students, Ruth Elnekave and Michael Bloom, with leadership awards. Elnekave ran the boys and girls tennis team, organized tryouts, picked and coached the teams. Bloom did the same with the cross-country (long distance running) and track teams, Fox said.

My Yiddishe Mommas

TORONTO — This city has a double version of "My Yiddishe Momma" in the persons of Selma Sage and Malcah Sufrin who sing traditional Yiddish melodies but also translate American folk songs like Clementine and When Irish Eyes Are Smiling into Yiddish.

While they usually only sing at family simchahs or parties for friends, Selma and Malcah crossed the border recently to sing at a standing-room-only fundraiser for Temple Beth Elohim in Wellesley, Mass.

The idea for the fundraiser came from Jodi Sufrin, Malcah's daughter, who is the cantor at Temple Beth Elohim. Jodi was the first Conservative cantor ordained in Canada.

In fact, Selma and Malcah met through Jodi, who was on the faculty at Holy Blossom Temple when Selma came here from Boston to succeed Heinz Warschauer as its education director in 1977. Selma's daughter, Lois Sage, who sings at Disneyland, in Orlando, Florida, is also a professional vocalist.

Both women bring an interesting background to their roles in the Yiddishe Mommas duet. Selma, a professor at York University where she lectures in biblical history, was involved in Jewish education and had her own Jewish radio show in Boston. A pianist, she was musical director of the famous Harvard University Hasty Pudding Show, the oldest College theatrical in United States. Malcah, a vocalist, taught for 27 years at Forest Hill Collegiate, and was a member of the Leslie Bell Singers.

Malcah's husband, Mel, a former vice-president of Canadian Press, is director of the Ontario Press Council, while Selma's husband, Sam Siegelman, is a pharmacist. The two Yiddishe Mommas are also bubbies — they have seven grandchildren each.

Israel Cancer Research Fund

The Israel Cancer Research Fund is an organization without walls, or even its own buildings. By using the buildings in other institutions, the Fund can put most of its money into research, keeping administrative costs down.

The ICRF supports 106 researchers at 16 different hospitals or universities in Israel, co-ordinating their work through a New York-based board of Canadian and American oncologists. Dr. Allan Bernstein of Mt. Sinai Hospital in Toronto is president of this board.

To update its own research, Mt. Sinai has brought Dr. Jacob Weinstein from Ben-Gurion University for each of the last two summers. Princess Margaret Hospital also brings a cancer researcher from Israel regularly.

The Israel Cancer Research Fund is the only Jewish organization to host one evening of the Toronto visit of the Barnes Collection of Art.

When Dr. Albert Barnes worked as an M.D. in Philadelphia in the 1920's, the most common disinfectant was iodine. He developed mercurochrome as the first non-painful disinfectant. Much of the money he earned from it, he spent on art; his collection includes works by Matisse, Miro, Utrillo, Cézanne, Manet, Monet and Degas. He also gave free art lessons to the workers in his mercurochrome factory.

In the late 1920's he showed his collection, which he kept in his Philadelphia mansion, to the art critic of Philadelphia's leading newspaper. The critic panned not only the art, but also the mansion. Thereafter, Dr. Barnes allowed almost no one to see the collection, except a few artists whom he invited personally. Since his death, it has been open to the public a few days a week for limited hours. His will stipulated that it was not to travel.

Recently, when the money in the trust fund for the collection began to run out, the executors had this stipulation of the will temporarily lifted. On the collection's first tour, to Washington, London, Paris and Tokyo, millions stood in line to see it. Later, the will was again temporarily lifted for a tour to Dallas and Toronto. Gluskin, Sheff are sponsors of the Toronto visit.

ICRF's evening is on Sunday, September 18, 7:00 to 10:00 p.m. The Exhibit is at the Art Gallery of Ontario until December 15.

Four hundred people can visit the exhibition each hour. The tickets specify what half-hour to be there. Each ticket is $125, of which 80 percent is tax deductible; this price includes a champagne supper. Sponsors include Barry Sherman of Apotex, Alan Obront, Larry Finkelstein, Harvey Albert, Ron Black, and Martin Dover, president of the Toronto branch of ICRF.

Space - the furniture frontier

Conquering the limits of household space is a science of ingenuity, good design and great products.

The Closet Shop has been providing innovative space solutions for over 15 years and now is adding custom space-expanding furniture to their successful closet building operation. This family-owned and operated company has built their business on a reputation for quality creative design and customer service. Repeat business and referral is the key to their success.

Your furniture solution begins with a free consultation to assess your needs. Whether it's a cleverly designed computer workstation for the home office, a home entertainment centre, an armoire or a wardrobe, a piece of custom furniture to complement your home decor can be space builder. There's not a nook, cranny or corner in a house that can't be fitted with a space-building custom unit.

Kids' rooms are a challenge for any family - finding enough places to store clothes, books and toys. Enter The Closet Shop with their expanded selection which includes juvenile furniture and even Murphy beds.

Matching your custom furniture to your existing decor is no problem with woodgrain finishes, acrylic and even faux finishes like granite and marble. Inside is the same quality European hardware found in the closet systems. Features like acrylic shoe cubbies and TV swivels are details that make these units work for you.

Responding to lifestyle trends by expanding the product line shows why The Closet Shop and Custom Furniture has become known as a progressive service-oriented company. Long a fixture in Forest Hill Village, The Closet Shop and Custom Furniture found itself in a familiar situation. They needed more space!

Owner Brenda Dales came up with the right solution - relocate to provide customers with a perfect showcase for all of their space-enhancing products. The new showroom is part of the factory facility and there's plenty of customer parking. On display will be the extensive selection of colour samples, door styles, trims and mouldings, plus their full range of storage accessories. Of course, their expert designers will still come to your place to help design the perfect closet or custom wine cellar.

Closet and custom furniture engineering is a science that's best left to the professionals - from concept to installation each project is unique, and the professional designers, cabinet makers and installers at The Closet Shop and Custom Furniture will make order reign.

Municipal Trust Expands Providing Full-Service in North York

North York, Ontario — Municipal Trust announces the expansion of their existing GIC/Mortgage office to a full financial services branch at 343 Wilson Ave. due to local requests for savings and chequing accounts. This is the first full-service Municipal Trust branch to be opened within the Metro Toronto area.

Joining Municipal Trust as Branch Manager at 343 Wilson Avenue is Maura De Luca who has 18 years of experience in the financial industry.

"There are so many choices today which can be confusing for the customer. We're committed to taking the time to help our customers understand the differences and benefits of financial opportunities available, from simple accounts to long term investments," explains De Luca.

Vacation Contest Promotion

Municipal Trust is celebrating the opening with a Vacation to the Heartland Contest in which one customer will win a seven day vacation for four to Deerhurst Resort in Huntsville.

At the same time, customers can receive bonus gifts for opening an account and a cash bonus for transferring an account from another financial institution.

"We are excited about expanding our services and showing customers the difference between Municipal Trust and our competition. The contest is one way to thank people for trying us out and for allowing us to prove to customers that we are indeed 'the hometown alternative to big city banks'," says De Luca.

Maura is part of the new breed of financial services managers who put "Providing Help To Our Customers" at the top of their daily "to do" list. "I meet so many people who are looking for more than a money machine," says Maura. "Let's face it, these are demanding times and folks want to know the best ways to build their future. It's my job - as well as the focus of our team in the branch - to help them do that to the best of our abilities."

Focus On Customer Service

With 29 community locations across the province, Municipal Trust offers a "main street" approach to financial services. This approach is backed by a service guarantee that states customers will be paid $5 if they wait more than five minutes in line. In addition, Municipal Trust will pay $5 should you find a mistake in your passbook or statement, not hear back from them in 24 hours about your loan application or feel at any time you haven't been treated with courtesy and respect.

"Today's customers expect good service wherever they shop. This means if you want to stand out in our business, banks and trust companies must be prepared to provide exceptional service. And that is what our service guarantee is all about," states De Luca.

Knowing The Customer

Maura De Luca's title may be Branch Manager but you'll see her tending cash too.

"You don't get to feel the pulse of the community by sitting in an office. I truly love meeting people and the way to do that is by being right up at the counter. So from time to time, I fill in and have a ball getting to know customers on a first name basis."

Municipal Trust has headquarters in Barrie, Ontario and is one of Canada's top five independent trust companies. With assets in excess of $1 billion, Municipal Trust provides quality financial services through 29 full-service branches located exclusively in Ontario.

Jewish Singles Registry - triple the fun

If you've been wandering around in a love desert, maybe it's time to take the initiative and do something about that drought in the romance department. Instead of just waiting and hoping for that one elusive person-of-your-dreams to come along, why not assert yourself and make it happen.

Maybe it's time for something a little different. Something non-threatening. And fun. Like the Jewish Singles Registry.

With offices in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, the Jewish Singles Registry is the largest service of its kind, anywhere in Canada.

The extensive membership roster includes quality single people representing all age groups, equally divided between men and women.

Members can easily network with each other from all three cities and do so on a regular basis.

"Many serious long-distance relationships have developed over the past year and we expect to have one, maybe even two marriages in the not too distance future," says Dora Korzinstone, the Registry's initial founder. "Expansion plans are even underway to expand the network to other cities across the country."

Unlike those promise-you-everything, deliver-next-to-nothing expensive match-making services, the Registry is a community-based organization that allows members to select for themselves the persons they wish to meet. No computers. No astrology. No psychic intuition. No mistakes. Because you do the choosing, what you get is what you see.

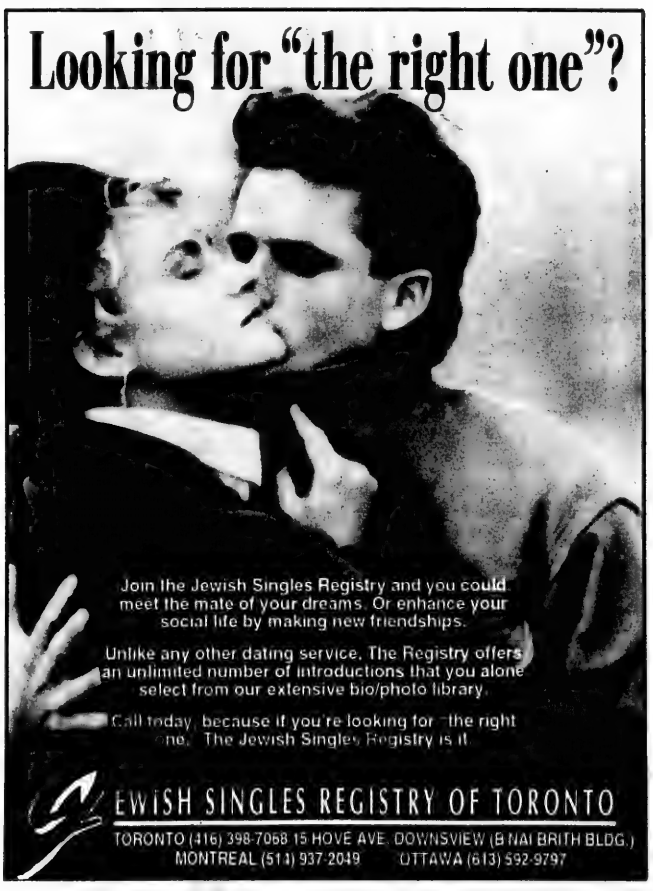
Applicants complete a questionnaire defining their personality, interests, hobbies, values and goals, as well as those qualities they are seeking in a prospective partner. This information, along with a photograph and the member's first name only, are entered into the Registry book. Members are then invited to schedule a private appointment to browse through the book and select the people to whom they would like to be introduced to.

The Registry will contact the person selected, allowing them to likewise view the information of the member who has chosen them. The service is strictly confidential and both parties must agree before any telephone numbers are disclosed.

Whether it's long distance or a local relationship, now you can read, learn all about and actually see what the other person looks like before any introduction is made. What more could you ask for from a service. . .

The Jewish Singles Registry is an introduction service like no other. It's honest. Straight forward. And very affordable. With no unwelcome surprises. Best of all, because you do the choosing — no date is a blind date.

For more information about the Jewish Singles Registry please call: in Montreal — 514-937-2049; in Toronto — 416-398-7068; in Ottawa — 613-592-9797.



Looking for "the right one"?
Join the Jewish Singles Registry and you could meet the mate of your dreams. Or enhance your social life by making new friendships.
Unlike any other dating service, The Registry offers an unlimited number of introductions that you alone select from our extensive bio/photo library.
Call today, because if you're looking for "the right one", The Jewish Singles Registry is it.

Funtastikids offers fabulous family fun

If you haven't yet entered your "second childhood," one visit to Funtastikids in the Promenade Village Shoppes at Bathurst and Centre will do the trick. The myriad of exciting entertainment options will have you wondering "where was all this when I was a kid?"

Relax. Funtastikids (the brainchild of sole owner Avi Hatuka) not only gives you the chance to participate with the "kinderlach", they insist on it. Funtastikids, you see, is not a day-care centre, but a giant indoor playground where parents share their children's fun and games. (If you're lucky, the kids will allow you an extra turn).

The centerpiece is a monster three-level play apparatus – the first of its kind in Canada – that includes a three-storey spiral slide, a ball pit, fun stairs, track glide, and other stations, all interconnected with tunnels and spheres. It's a fun way to develop motor skills and fitness; one go-round will have you ready for the army! All corners are rounded, heavily padded, and connected by flexible netting for the ultimate in safety.

Safety and security, in fact, are almost an obsession here. All activities are carefully supervised by trained staff members and monitored on closed-circuit television.

A skill game area includes two variations of mini-basketball for your budding "Raptors", as well as Skee Ball and other games. There's a well-padded toddler area for ages 1-3, and four quaintly-windowed party/meeting rooms that resemble little houses – an ideal setting for birthday parties, which can be kosher catered if desired.

Amenities include a seating area overlooking the playground, a full-service snack bar, and a shoe check.

The entire facility is awash with bright colours from floor to ceiling, with a fairy-tale look and feel that'll give it instant credibility with your kids. They'll never mistake it for a school, but they can learn here, from arts and crafts to friendly lectures by health professionals.

All this and more is available from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. seven days a week for only $6.95 per child (parents or guardians free), and free in-house babysitting is provided for up to five children at a time. If you want to shop in the Promenade Mall directly across the parking lot, or run errands elsewhere while your children play, you can be given a pager and contacted when your children are finished. Funtastikids has also created the Funtastic Value Passport, which allows large families to realize considerable savings on the regular admission rate.

And you're greeted by a dinosaur mural that's the envy of Jurassic Park.

This place really is Funtastic!

Quasar Mode offerings bright and light as air

"Don't forget to smell the roses." Easier said than done. But Quasar Mode, Toronto's home of fabulous French fashions, has a sure-fire remedy: wear them. With a little help from Chacok's fabulous florals for spring '94, every glance in the mirror (and a spring shower of compliments) will remind you of the roses. And the dahlias (see the giant dahlia print below), the tulips, the daffodils and . . . business? What business?

Ah yes, business. Have no fear: these petals don't wilt in the boardroom. Rather, they gain in appeal, and may even (o miracle of miracles) help your colleagues smell the roses too.

But florals aren't all that's growing in the Quasar garden. Exclusive spring collections from Paris (Geneviève Tarka, Boa, Emmanuelle Khahn, Martine Douvier) and Milan (Mariella Burani) will carry you through the summer months with elegance and élan.

Many of Quasar's spring creations are so sheer that you can actually layer them and still shrug off the summer heat. Versatility is another keynote; most pieces carry effortlessly from day to evening. One example is a majestic orange sherbert ankle-length front-buttoned dress from Chacok in pure linen jersey. Is it day wear, or is it evening wear? You decide.

From Martine Douvier, there's a striking scarlet long linen jacket with loosely-knit raw silk sleeves, as well as elegant linen walking jackets with matching pants in amber, stone and olive.

From Boa, flounce print skirt with wraparound halter top

All the collections, in fact, reflect the zest for living with which Quasar Mode approaches the '90s. Rigid, structured garments are eschewed in favour of flowing shapes, and dull colour conventions are shunned with a passion unmatched on the Toronto fashion scene.

Yiddish concert draws over 2,000

By HINDY NOSEK-ABELSON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — They brought lawn chairs, blankets, picnics, umbrellas, families and friends.

In all, over 2,000 festive Yiddish devotees and "folk-fans" of all ages came out to the 15th annual Yiddish concert at Earl Bales Park on June 20. Mayor Mel Lastman presented the traditional greetings from North York, with a few funny asides in halting mame-loshen, and Jay Brodbar, associate director of Community Planning and Allocations, stressed Federation's continued commitment to Yiddish. Gerry Kane, chair of the Yiddish Committee, welcomed everyone, and Richard Bassett introduced the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and Theresa Tova.

The audience was treated to close to two hours of musical pleasure.

The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band featuring David Buchbinder, Laura Cesar, Jim Gelcer, Alex Luminsky, Paul Pacanowski, Allan Merovitz, and guest violinist Steve Greenman from Cleveland, were in top form. Admirably this group has broadened their repertoire beyond the usual "freilichs" generally associated with Klezmer music. Even the old standards were performed with unusual panache.

Merovitz gave a moving vocal rendition of Friling (Springtime) by the famous Yiddish songwriter and poet Shmerke Kacherginsky. A love song written during the Holocaust and scored in a defiant tango rhythm, it was first performed in the Vilna ghetto and definitely merits showcasing again. As does the old Yam Lid (Ocean Song), originally composed by Yehuda Halevi and subsequently translated into Yiddish by Chaim Nachman Bialik, sung by Buchbinder.

Tova, Gemini nominee from the award-winning television show ENG and famous diva around Toronto's major night spots, knows how to appeal to a crowd. Her cabaret-like renditions of Yiddish theatre songs were presented with sincerity, passion and humor. Together with her favorite pianist, the talented jazz man John Alcorn, Tova transported the audience to a time when Yiddish Theatre was at its peak. Negotiating her way through a repertoire that ran the gamut from the torchy Oygn to the tragic Mazl — and from the sexy Leybke Kum Tantsn to the hilarious Ich Bin a Border bi Mayn Vayb (I'm Just a Boarder at My Wife's), she demonstrated a rare versatility.

Her collaborative numbers with the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band went off well, notwithstanding a somewhat uneven sound system.

Because of the rain that fell on and off during the evening, the concert had to be cut short by two numbers. But this was an evening on a par with the best of Yiddish entertainment anywhere and anytime.

Toronto is fortunate that this wealth of young Yiddish talent is completely home grown and available for our enjoyment right now.

This year's program was coordinated by Aaron Fainer, Cantor Louis Danto and Sylvia Lustgarten.

Hats off to Flying Bulgars

Hats off to the Flying Bulgars for retrieving these cultural nuggets and presenting them to audiences as far away as the Shetland Islands, where the group recently performed. As an added bonus, the Flying Bulgars played host to talented young violinist Greenman, who captivated everyone with his spirited fiddling. Greenman plays with the Cleveland band, Yiddishe Cup.

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

The audience consisted of about 50 journalists, and there was a row of six television cameras at the back of the theatre. The lights went down, a spotlight shone on a podium on the decorated stage, and an unseen announcer proclaimed: "Ladies and gentleman, Mr. Garth Drabinsky." Then out from between some potted palms stepped Canada's most famous theatrical showman, large as life and clearly ready for his close-up.

Last week's press announcement that Drabinsky's Live Entertainment of Canada, Inc. is importing the Andrew Lloyd Webber musical Sunset Boulevard to the North York Performing Arts Centre in November 1995, was high drama in itself. Drabinsky made the announcement personally, his presentation complemented by a clever video presentation interspersing highlights from the musical and the Billy Wilder movie of the same name. A question-and-answer session with the press followed. What other scene could have better demonstrated Toronto's emergence as one of the world's foremost cities for theatre, right after London and New York?

Drabinsky reminded his audience of the many accomplishments of director and screenwriter Billy Wilder, who ruled Hollywood during its golden era from 1944 to 1960.

Wilder's classics

Wilder was responsible for such classics as Double Indemnity (starring Fred MacMurray and Barbara Stanwyck); The Lost Weekend (Ray Milland); The Seven Year Itch (Marilyn Monroe); Witness for the Prosecution (Marlene Dietrich); Some Like It Hot (Marilyn Monroe, Jack Lemmon, Tony Curtis); and — one of Drabinsky's favourites — The Apartment (Jack Lemmon, Shirley MacLaine).

Then there was Sunset Boulevard, a film noir classic about Norma Desmond, a dethroned movie queen trying to make a comeback to the big screen, but finding tragedy instead. The film starred Gloria Swanson, William Holden and Eric von Stroheim. Despite much pressure to can production, Wilder persisted and the film opened at New York's Radio City Music Hall in August 1950. It received rave reviews and grossed an astonishing $100,000 at the box office the first weekend, at a time when ticket prices started at 80 cents. In one week, the pic grossed $166,000, then a record high. Ticket buyers formed long line-ups both for the movie and for the theatrical production in London and Los Angeles. These details Drabinsky seemed to relish in the telling.

A dream project of Andrew Lloyd Webber for more than a decade, Sunset Boulevard opened at London's Adelphi Theatre in 1993, with Patti LuPone playing Norma Desmond. Last December, it opened in Los Angeles, with Glenn Close in the lead role. It is set to open on Broadway in November with Close again taking the lead. Movie actress Faye Dunaway is preparing to take over the role of the aging silent screen star in Los Angeles. Like its predecessors, the Toronto production should cost about $12 million, although Drabinsky said he may be able to stage it for less. Trevor Nunn is to direct.

As for Show Boat, the musical about life on the Mississippi, it will just keep rolling along in the manner of Old Man River — or more exactly, it will transfer to another theatre as yet undetermined. Still playing to sold-out houses, it is scheduled to finish its run at the North York Performing Arts Centre in October 1995.

What's In A Name?: That Mel Lastman can sell refrigerators to the Inuit. Who's more savvy at selling than Mel? Nooo-body. Now the Apotex Foundation, the charitable arm of Canada's largest generic drug company, has pledged a $1-million donation to rename the Main Stage of the North York Performing Arts Centre. The Main Stage, home of the smash hit Show Boat, is set to be officially renamed the Apotex Theatre this fall. North York Council has approved the deal, signed in cooperation with Apotex Inc. president Dr. Barry Sherman and Live Entertainment of Canada Inc., the Centre's private sector producer and operator.

Names of the other stages in the North York complex are still up for grabs, says Lastman. "Using this approach, we are ensuring that our taxpayers will not be subsidizing our Centre ... Our naming program is expected to raise a total of $10 million."

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

Stalin Against The Jews by Arkady Vaksberg $32 Random House
Lenin's Tomb by David Remnick $18.95 (paperbound) Random House

Soviet leaders

Stalin was among history's great mass murderers. According to historian Roy Medvedev, his victims numbered 40 million. Solzhenitsyn insists that the number is far greater — perhaps 60 million. Lady Astor, a well-known British political figure, once asked Stalin, "How long will you go on killing people?" "As long as necessary," he answered. The monster of cruelty died of a stroke in March 1953.

Strangely, many Western intellectuals were all too willing to indulge Stalin in his cruelties. These included George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells and the American ambassador to Moscow, Joseph Davies, who wrote of him that "a child would like to sit on his lap and a dog would sidle up to him."

Following World War II a series of official anti-Jewish measures, as well as many anti-Jewish incidents, led to the eradication of almost all aspects of Jewish cultural and religious life. In 1948, the legendary actor and producer Salomon Mikhoels, was killed in what most Soviet experts believe was an arranged car crash.

Within days of Mikhoels' death the Yiddish theatre and all Jewish schools were closed, and all Hebrew linotype machines in the Soviet Union were smashed. Within a few months, more than 400 leading Jewish writers and scientists were arrested. By 1952 almost all of them had perished in labor camps.

In that same year 25 Jewish intellectuals — one of them a distinguished woman biochemist, Lina Shtern — were brought to trial. A week later all were convicted of plotting to detach the Crimea from the Soviet Union in order to turn it into a "Zionist bourgeois republic" which would serve as "an American Imperialist base for aggressive anti-Soviet designs." The 24 men were executed. Shtern was given a 25-year sentence.

In January, 1953 Stalin launched a new attack accusing a number of doctors of a widespread and sinister conspiracy against the life of the State. Fourteen doctors, the majority of them Jews, were at once arrested and charged with sabotage, terrorism and espionage. At the same time plans were made to deport hundreds of thousands of Jews to Siberia. Stalin's death two months later, before the doctors could be tried or the deportation plans carried out, led to a moment of mass relief among Soviet Jewry. The doctors were released. The deportation plans were shelved.

Arkady Vaksberg is a Moscow journalist-lawyer with a number of books on Soviet history and politics to his credit. Stalin Against the Jews is the first full-scale account of Stalin's relations with Jews, from his accession to power to his unlamented death. The author shows, among other things, how during the war Stalin made use of a Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee to win world Jewish support, and that members of this group would later be targeted as "Zionist conspirators."

In a final chapter the author describes anti-Semitic activity in Russia today. "As the heirs of Stalin's strategy in the Jewish question and the successors of Russia's pogrom groups, today's anti-Semitic gangs are a unique hybrid of Bolshevism, terrorism and patriotism, under the flag of superpowerhood based on racial purity." However, he is sure that although anti-Semitism exists, it has lost its support in the mass consciousness. Stalin did not finish his work and his heirs are having a very hard time of it. Stalin's time is gone and it will not return.

Lenin's Tomb is an eloquent, riveting, largely oral history by a talented American journalist that contains much information of Jewish interest. It is filled with the extraordinary events of the last days of the Soviet Empire. It is highly recommended.

Doidge wins literary award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Although science and the arts are not mutually exclusive, few individuals have excelled in both fields.

Norman Doidge is one of those rare people, combining his profession as a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst with his talent as a poet and essayist.

Head of the assessment clinic at the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry, Doidge will direct the Institute's psychotherapy centre in July. And he recently won a $10,000 CBC/Saturday Night Literary Award in the personal memoir category for his essay, The Suit, a reflection on his father's accidental death at the age of 33, when Doidge was 17 months old.

Doidge's prize-winning essay appeared in the June edition of Saturday Night magazine. It tells of the experiences of his father, Leon Greenspan, during the Holocaust, focusing on a suit that belonged to his father. The suit has remained a cherished possession of Doidge's uncle, Henry Greenspan, who was in Oscar Schindler's camp. Doidge recently read his essay on CBC Radio's Between The Covers.

CBC Radio has sponsored the literary competition for 15 years. This is the first year that the awards were co-sponsored by Saturday Night. More than 5,000 entries were received by the nation-wide competition, which has three categories — personal memoirs, poetry and short stories. It is considered the most prestigious literary competition for unpublished work in the country.

Doidge teaches a course on literature and psychiatry to psychiatrists-in-training at the Clarke Institute. He was recently invited to the White House to present his views on the scientific basis of psychotherapy and psychoanalysis.

Norman Doidge

Doidge, 40, says his first love is poetry; he has won several literary awards for his poetry. While a student of classics, philosophy and medicine at the University of Toronto, he won the E. J. Pratt Prize for poetry and was cited by Prof. Northrop Fry, who praised Doidge's writing as "really remarkable . . . haunting and memorable."

Doidge took his specialty training in psychiatry at Columbia University in New York City and was a National Institute of Mental Health Research Fellow at Columbia for two years. He teaches at the University of Toronto and Columbia University.

Doidge is currently completing a book of meditative and lyrical poems on biblical themes.

Of his essay on his father, he says, "It is very sweet to be able to fulfil the commandment to honor thy father by telling a story about virtue, his virtue, that he did not live to tell."

Despite his busy schedule, Doidge has also been involved in Jewish affairs since his student days. He was editor-in-chief of the Toronto-based Masada Magazine, a Jewish historical quarterly with a circulation of 50,000.

He was one of the founders of the Canadian Association of Ethiopian Jews (CAEJ) and led a group of doctors and health professionals to Ethiopia in one of the first trips to bring money, supplies and medicine to the country during the famine.

Family problems spotlighted

TORONTO — A neglected Jewish mother who turns to drink to ease her pain, a marriage about to hit the rocks, and a man who can't forgive his brother until its almost too late, are the elements in There Comes a Time, a full-length drama by seasoned actors Fran Biderman and Roselle Stone.

The characters in this new play leap off the page, so relevant are they to today's family problems in the Jewish community. The neglected mother lands a child-sitting job to eke out her income, with dire results; her son feels guilty and bereft in what has become a loveless marriage; the upscale daughter-in-law finds there is more to life than money and social prestige.

Though a commercial production of There Comes a Time is not yet in the works, the play, and the acting abilities of its authors are available to groups who want to educate their members and volunteers about family dynamics by staging parts of the play in a workshop setting. For further information, call Stone at 633-2057.

Nahariya Youth Orchestra set to perform in Toronto

TORONTO — One of the world's finest youth orchestras will be stopping in Toronto on its 1994 North American tour.

The Nahariya Youth Orchestra, with 48 11- to 17-year-old musicians, will be giving a community-wide performance at the North York Performing Arts Centre on July 6 at 8 p.m. The concert will be honoring the Golden Givers of United Jewish Appeal, who have been contributing for at least 25 years.

The orchestra, established in 1973, was awarded third place during an international competition in Valencia, Spain, four years ago.

A number of the orchestra's members are already being touted as child prodigies. A special addition to the 1994 tour is singer Shiraz Ovadiya, 13, of Romanian background, who has been performing with her father since early childhood.

Nahariya, near the Labenese border, has close ties to Canada. The Canadian Jewish community has funded several projects and programs in the area.

Orchestra members will be billeted with Jewish families during their stay. Those interested in hosting one of the young musicians should contact Dyanoosh Youssefi at (416) 636-7655.

Tickets for the performance are $10 in advance and $12 at the door. They can be purchased by calling the UJA Hotline at (416) 631-5705 or through Ticketmaster (416) 872-2222 (a service charge will apply.) Concert proceeds will go to United Jewish Appeal.

The performance is being sponsored by the Golden Giver Program of United Jewish Appeal, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Israel Government Tourist Office.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Several months ago in Philadelphia, a group of breakfasting travel writers happened to agree on something: hotel brochures should never show their lovely premises devoid of people. Hotel managers sometimes do not understand this. One lady, who explained that she had once worked at a California hotel (which she didn't identify), said that a photographer from Architectural Digest had come to shoot its most glamorous suite. He had wanted to put a folded newspaper or umbrella in the room to show that it was occupied. But the hotel manager's instinct was to show the room with no trace of its despoiling human occupants, and he had to be physically restrained from snatching up the subtle telltale evidence.

"Was that hotel in San Francisco?" someone asked.

"Indeed, it was," said the lady.

"Was it a Nob Hill hotel?"

"Why, yes," said the lady, amazed.

"Was it, by any chance, the Huntington Hotel?"

"Yes it was!"

"And could it possibly have been Room 501?"

The lady gasped.

This had been more than just a lucky guess on my part. Several months earlier, I had enjoyed the distinct privilege of staying at the Huntington Hotel while researching a magazine article on The Suites of San Francisco. Somehow — don't ask me how — they had discerned my purpose and had bumped me upstairs into the grand suite of 501.

Nob Hill is an exclusive district on a high hill in the centre of the city. It boasts numerous fine hotels as well as the Grace Cathedral, an outstanding Gothic monument, which I could see from my room — I mean, my rooms. There were six of them in the suite, not including several closets of impressive dimensions.

Room 501 was, well, a spread straight out of Architectural Digest. Its interior designer had evidently had intense comfort and non-intrusive stylishness in mind. It wasn't a mausoleum and I wasn't afraid to leave a folded newspaper or umbrella lying around.

The Huntington offers impressive views of the bay and the city, as well as of other local hotels. It has prestigious neighbors. At one point I visited the Fairmont Hotel nearby for an inspection tour, but my timing was bad: the staff was preparing for an imminent visit by President Clinton. Other establishments in the vicinity include the stately Ritz Carlton and the Mark Hopkins, with its famous Top of the Mark cocktail lounge.

Designing hotels

The Atlanta-based hotel architect John Portman is famous for designing hotels with large atrium lobbies and shopping centres that are cities within the city. Two examples of his work are the Hyatt Regency Embarcadero in San Francisco and the Hyatt Regency Peachtree Centre in Atlanta. Portman, who has been called "the most American architect after Frank Lloyd Wright," has built up a financial empire, allowing him to build his dreams.

In interviews, Portman has explained that he approached hotel design from the guest side of the registration desk. Until the sixties, hotels often consisted of a "slab building" on a congested city block. "You went in the hotel and found a low-ceilinged lobby, a registration desk, a newsstand, and possibly a bar with a few club chairs. You went upstairs in a closed-in elevator, got off on a dimly lit corridor, walked down the corridor and went into your cell-like room. Like a cell, the room had a hole in the outside wall, which was the window, and that was it."

Visual relief

His antidote to the dull cubist mentality was a vast, open interior "park", providing visual and spatial relief from the busy, noisy, smog-filled city streets. Glass elevators moving through open space, he discovered, create a sense of fun and dynamism.

Built in 1973, the Hyatt Regency Embarcadero remains one of San Francisco's most distinctive hotels. It is particularly known for its stunning lobby with its huge round sculpture. Its vast scale and modernistic flourishes, however, may overwhelm travellers with simple tastes.

Provided their budgets are not also simple, such persons may prefer the Pan Pacific Hotel on Post Street, in the historic Union Square neighborhood. Also designed by John Portman, it opened as the Portman Hotel in 1987; he sold it three years later. More intimate and refined than the Hyatt Embarcadero, it's a charming luxury hotel and a subdued study in elegance.

San Francisco's Chinatown is one of the most famous and historic in North America. Its streets and alleys reverberate with colorful history, the sizzle of Wok cooking, and the clatter of Mah Jong tiles. Shirley Fong-Torres's culinary and historical walking tours include visits to a numerous markets and shops, a herbalist, a fortune cookie factory and a Chinese brush painter.

Royal Botanical Gardens reaches out to ethnic groups

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — An invitation to join the Royal Botanical Gardens' proposed new Peoples Advisory Council has gone out to all local cultural and ethnic groups, including the Jewish community.

The council's purpose is "to develop and recommend guidelines which will foster an environment and a vehicle that is more inclusive of all cultures; to enlighten and promote the general public's awareness of various cultures; ensure that their communities have input into the decision making process of Royal Botanical Gardens; and to encourage and promote community involvement with RBG at all possible levels."

The council will work in conjunction with the garden's development department on exhibitions, art shows, festivals, lectures, workshops and special gardens.

Hamilton-Wentworth and area Jewish Federation executive director Patricia Tolkin Eppel said she thinks the council is "a wonderful idea." She said she will try to find someone to represent the community.

How those communities are represented differs. Multicultural coordinator Rob Diaz said the Japanese community conducts a flower arranging workshop and a flower show in the fall, and the First Nation community has proposed a garden of plants native to Canada when the first settlers arrived.

The Portuguese, Italian and East Indian communities have also expressed an interest in taking part.

As well, hopes Diaz, council members will promote the gardens in their own communities.

Located a mere 45-minute drive from Toronto and easily accessible from various other southwestern Ontario centres, the Royal Botanical Gardens are a great place for a day's outing and are open year round except Dec. 25.

The 2,700 acres include nature trails, wetlands and woodlands as well as specific gardens such as the Rock Garden; the Laking Garden, famous for its collection of perennials and irises in particular; and the Rose Garden and Hendrie Park, featuring two acres of roses as well as clematis, lilies, annual trails, medicinal and scented plants.

The world's largest collection of lilacs is in the Arboretum, which also features rhododendrons and other flowering shrubs and trees, and contains the Nature Centre with displays on Project Paradise, the current restoration project of the Cootes Paradise marsh.

In the heart of Westdale there's the Teaching Garden with fruits, vegetables and herbs, a favorite with youngsters interested in learning gardening skills.

And in the RBG Centre there's the Mediterranean Garden, best viewed between January and April, when it's a welcome respite from mid-winter blues, or on rainy days.

Year-round activities include specific flower shows, educational programs, garden tours, plant and bulb sales, workshops, concerts and various festivals and children's programs.

All outdoor gardens are open daily from 9.30 a.m. to 6 p.m.; the Mediterranean Garden: 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.; and the Floral Art Shop at the RBG Centre daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. but closed from Christmas until mid-January and on Mondays from January through March.

Admission fees are $4.25 for adults; seniors and children 5 to 12, $3.25. Family admission, two adults and children, is $10.75, and admission to the Mediterranean Garden is $2.

Special group rates and guided tours are available. For information and a calendar of events call Visitor Services (905) 527-1158 ext. 252, or 1-800-668-9449 anywhere in Ontario and Quebec.

To get there from Toronto, follow the Queen Elizabeth Way West, then take Highway 403, (follow signs for Hamilton/Brantford). Exit at Hwy. No. 6 North, turn right at the first traffic light and watch for RBG signs.

Casino charters hit jackpot

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — While Ontario has pocketed its first $3.3 million from the Windsor Casino, a new Toronto business has made its own winnings on the heels of the casino's recent grand opening.

Canadian Casino Charters, which runs buses from Scarborough, North York and Mississauga to Windsor Casino seven days a week, has already delivered more than 1,000 people to the doors of Ontario's new gambling establishment. What has steered their business onto a road paved with gold is guaranteed entrance for all passengers, without having to wait in line.

"There are about 17,000 patrons who go through the casino daily and the capacity is only 4,100 — so lineups can be very, very long," said Canadian Casino Charters president Steve Tobis, who with partner Mike Federman opened for business May 27.

"We have secured guaranteed admission passes that allow our passengers to enter immediately."

Windsor Casino, built on the former site of the Windsor Art Gallery and designed to resemble a castle, sits on the recently remodelled Detroit River waterfront. The three-storey building houses blackjack, roulette, baccarat, mini-baccarat, keno, joker poker and 1,800 slot machines.

A 200-seat restaurant on the second floor serves Chinese, delicatessen and Italian food. There are bars and lounges on each floor, the dress code is casual and smoking and drinking are allowed throughout.

Canadian Casino Charters is one of two bus charter companies still standing after the smoke cleared from the clamor to capitalize on the casino opening. "Our ace in the hole, so to speak, is not only guaranteed admission from June to September, but great value too," Tobis said. "While the fair market price for our package — just to cover cost — is $79, the competition caused us to drop it to $49."

The price includes one-day return trip on a luxury coach and two-for-one meal coupons from selected Golden Griddle and Howard Johnson's restaurants.

The company's ad campaign, a take-off on Bad Boy's "Nooooobody," features cartoon caricatures of Richard Nixon, Marilyn Monroe and Groucho Marx saying "Evvvvcrybody goes for Windsor Casino!"

Tobis, who owned Canada's second largest distributor of ice cream, Mr. Frosty, from 1977 to 1984, was also involved with 27 Albion Flea Market for five years.

He believes he'll hit the jackpot with this new business. "We were in the right place at the right time. Windsor is getting a new lease on life — and we're going to be part of that success."

Former Bank Chairman Sentenced

JERUSALEM — Former Bank Leumi chairman Ernst Japhet, the last senior official to face trial, received a longer prison sentence than the other executives in the 1983 financial scandal.

He was sentenced to an 11-month prison term and fined some $300,000 for fraudulently manipulating his bank's shares in the country's biggest financial scandal ever.

Japhet returned here from New York four months ago after fleeing Israel more than 10 years ago.

Japhet's sentence was the severest to be handed down by the Jerusalem District Court against any of those involved in the affair.

The manipulation of bank share prices a decade ago spurred buying of shares until they dominated 70 per cent of the market. When the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) crashed in October 1983, many small investors and private businesses were devastated and billions of shekels were lost.

No. 1 Salesperson

TORONTO — The national standings for Homelife/Realty services were recently released and Steve Gerlock of Homelife/Partners Realty Inc. was the No. 1 salesperson in the Ontario region.

This region represents 105 offices and more than 2500 sales people.

He also ranked No. 2 in Canada out of more than 5,000 real estate representatives.

Gerlock has been selling residential real estate for 14 years. He was the No. 1 salesperson for a national real estate company during the '80s and managed a successful office for two years.

An Increase in Loans

OTTAWA — Industry Minister John Manley announced recently that loans to small businesses in Canada, under the Small Business Loans Act (SBLA) sharply increased in January, February and March 1994.

The total of these loans, $561 million, exceeds the value of all loans for the fiscal year 1992-93.

Over the 12 months ending March 31, 1994, the amount of loans increased more than four-fold to $2.3 billion from the previous year, Manley said. He added that this points to a promising increase in small business activity as well as a follow-through by major banks in their commitment to boost support to small businesses.

Aircraft maker nosedives

By SIMON GRIVER
World Zionist Press Service

ISRAEL — Innovative space rockets, sophisticated fighter planes and state-of-the-art missile systems once made Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) the quintessential success story, but now the company is on the verge of bankruptcy.

Badly hurt by post-Cold War military cutbacks and government reluctance to invest in unprofitable enterprises, IAI posted a $400 million loss in 1993.

Of that, $80 million was in operating losses and $320 million in early retirement packages, said IAI's vice-president of finance, Shmuel Peretz. That follows a $148 million loss in 1992.

Last year the Israeli government proposed a controversial recovery plan.

"It is impossible to live in the past," said Finance Minister Avraham Shohat, whose plan calls for firing between 2,500 and 2,900 workers over a four-month period and cutting the remaining 16,000 employees' salaries by 15 per cent.

The government is expected to underwrite about $240 million of IAI's loss and inject $300 million into the company to cover compensation payoffs.

IAI workers got wind of the plan and blocked the Ben Gurion Airport's runway and the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem highway in October 1993 to demonstrate against the proposed layoffs.

"The workers are confused and demoralized," said workers committee chair Rafi Hatam. "We still believe that this company has great potential and will fight all efforts to sell it off."

Other employees agree. "In my opinion there's no need for such drastic cuts," said one longtime IAI employee who wished to remain anonymous.

" Our balance sheet is good all in all. The economists say so. We're not happy with the way things are being handled and the atmosphere among the workers is pessimistic. We don't hold out much hope."

The IAI was established in 1969 to help fill the gap left when Israel's traditional arms suppliers, France and Britain, imposed military embargoes after the 1967 Six Day War.

IAI succeeded beyond all expectations, developing and manufacturing a state-of-the-art combat aircraft, the Kfir, by the mid-'70s.

Ten years later, IAI had helped put Israel into space with the Amos satellite and was working on the Lavi, a combat jet on the cutting edge of aeronautical technology. But in 1987, the U.S. administration withdrew funding for the Lavi, which they saw as a redundant duplication of their own F-16, and the Israeli government killed the project.

The Arrow anti-tactical ballistic missle, the most sophisticated project of its kind anywhere in the world, may soon go the same route.

The government recovery plan calls for justification by profit. Salary hikes included in the public sector wage agreement will be given only to those workers from profitable divisions, as long as those raises will not endanger the profits.

Tsomet MK Alex Goldfarb feels that the government must decide IAI's fate in light of security considerations rather than profit and loss.

"The government could also help Israel Aircraft Industries financially," he said. "It could insist that El Al and other government companies use IAI's services."

IAI spokeswoman Sylvia Beit Halachmi said too much emphasis is being placed on the negative. "The glass may be half empty but it's also half full," she said, citing the fact that IAI recently became the fourth company in the world to receive McDonnell Douglas's gold preferred status.

As Israel's largest exporter with $1.19 billion worth of goods in 1992, IAI supplies parts to the American aircraft manufacturer for its F-15 Eagle fighter and produces unmanned aircraft drones for the United States Air Force.

It manufactures the popular Weston executive jet and is a leader in the reconfiguration and upgrading of passenger aircraft like the Boeing 747, DC-10 and Russian-made planes.

Other products include hydraulic, electro-mechanical and pneumatic systems for aircraft, combat vehicles, engineering equipment, guns and patrol boats.

Israel Aircraft Industries has $1.2 billion worth of orders for 1994 — less than expected, but still a substantial amount. It's all very much a question of whether or not IAI can overcome its current hardships and come out of the present crisis smaller but stronger.

Biotech research boosted

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — A new $15-million venture capital fund to boost promising Israeli research has been established by two of the country's pioneers of biotechnology.

The Israel Bio Fund, backed by leading U.S. industrialists, will launch 15 to 20 bio-tech projects based on Israeli scientific research in the next two years.

One of the fund's initiators, Dr. Yoram Karmon, a former CEO and president of InterPharm, says he sees room for strategy partnerships with Canadian companies as well.

"An alliance with a Canadian company could help us penetrate the U.S. market. At the same time, we could provide a shortcut for a Canadian company trying to enter the European market," says Karmon who, during his years as president of InterPharm, turned a financially troubled operation into the largest biotechnology company in Israel.

After leaving InterPharm a year ago, Karmon joined forces with Dr. Haim Aviv, a former Weizmann Institute professor considered to be the father of biotechnology in Israel, and together they laid the groundwork for the Israel Bio Fund.

"There are over a thousand Israeli scientists working on hundreds of promising research projects in the life sciences. Many of these projects have great commercial potential that is not being exploited," explains Karmon.

"We hope to change that by supplying funding and commercial direction at the early stages of research."

To date, the fund has mobilized support from the American Baxter Healthcare Corp., one of the largest health care companies in the world; from Merril Lynch vice-chair Stephen Hammerman and a group of U.S. investors; and from the Israel-based Yozama Venture Capital Fund, headed by the former chief scientist of the Ministry of Science, Yigal Erlich.

The Israel Bio Fund will locate, manage and secure financing for innovative projects in the fields of biopharmaceuticals, therapy, immunotheraphy, medical health care devices, organ transplants and agricultural and environmental products.

"The chances of success of a new biotech product depend largely on whether it has sufficient funding for the first five years," says Karmon, who maintains that until now such critical early stage financing has been unavailable in Israel.

While the chief scientist of Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade offers money for research and development, this funding comes with strings attached.

"One restriction of government funding is that production must be done in Israel. No multinational company will want to manufacture a product in Israel if it costs half as much to do it in Thailand," argues Karmon. "Early stage financing — with no strings attached — is the main advantage of our fund," he says.

The new fund will also provide scientists with guidance in developing products that conform to the requirements of the American Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and the equivalent regulatory bodies in Europe. "This is the challenge for new biotech products," says Karmon. "Very few Israeli companies have any experience in going through the long and arduous regulatory process."

As the founders or managers of eight successful export-oriented companies in Israel, all in the field of biotechnology and pharmaceuticals, Karmon and Aviv believe their expertise will be valuable to other Israeli scientists. The international contacts of Baxter will help locate commercial opportunities for Israeli products and technologies, adds Karmon.

The next two years will be spent locating potential "winners" from among the hundreds of promising projects being conducted in Israel's 10 universities and research institutes.

Each will receive an initial injection of $1 million for organizational puposes. The rest of the funding will be used to develop these companies over a five-year period, including mobilization of additional financing through private placements and public offerings.

These companies will also begin to form strategic alliances with other firms, in order to market their products.

"Alliances with Canadian companies could be of mutual benefit," says Karmon. "We can help each other penetrate different markets."

This week The CJN features... The Jewish Singles Registry

By RUTH SCHWEITZER

TORONTO — People who use a dating service should have their feet firmly planted on the ground, according to the owner of the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto.

Don't expect to meet the person of your dreams the same day or the day after you join, advised Rob Singer. Although you could be dating within a week of joining a service, you will need to be patient as it will take some time to find Mr. or Ms. Right.

He pointed out that one former client registered with the Montreal office, waited four years to meet his wife. "He didn't give up and now he's the happiest person in the world."

These days there is less of a stigma attached to using dating services, mainly because people have discovered they work. The so-called "losers" who are said to frequent the services do not exist, Singer noted, adding that people who register with him are Jewish professionals who work long hours. They don't have a lot of time to socialize. They find meeting people through a service is easier than going to parties or bars and they are tired of blind dates.

Singer pointed out that many people who used to go to parties with the expectation that they would meet people have been disappointed. "Then they say they're just not going to parties anymore."

The chances of meeting at a party are slim, he pointed out. The music is too loud and people usually attend in groups. "It's hard to approach her when she's got three of her girlfriends standing beside her," said Singer.

Jews have even more of a problem meeting as the community is diverse and widespread, without a central meeting place. Another issue for Jews, he said, is that they are under pressure from their families to marry and marry Jewish. They are unlikely to find many of their counterparts at work or at nightclubs. "You're dealing with a limited number of people."

That is where a Jewish dating service can step in, making the search much easier. Hundreds of people are registered with them.

Singer advised potential dating service clients to look for a service with a proven track record. "New agencies are popping up all the time and they try it for a while. They find out it doesn't work, so they go out of business."

He suggested asking friends or relatives who have used a dating service for recommendations. Many people know someone who has been registered with one, he said, although not everyone will admit to it.

Fears people may have about meeting someone through a dating service are unfounded, he stressed. "It is not as scary or threatening as people think."

Originally from Montreal, Singer was asked by the Jewish Singles Registry of Montreal to open a Toronto branch. Intrigued by the concept, he bought the business, which includes the Montreal office and a branch in Ottawa. He founded the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto a year and a half ago. Toronto currently has 450 members, while Montreal has over 1,500.

Everyone wishing to register fills out a questionnaire that asks for general information such as age, date of birth and whether they smoke or not. The form has questions about personality, values, goals and interests. Three wishes are requested as well, to give further insight into an applicant's personality.

Information from the questionnaire and pictures are classified into binders according to age and gender. The binders include singles from Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa. When someone finds a person they would like to date in one of the binders, the second party is invited to the Registry to read the first party's bio and look at his or her picture. If the second party is agreeable, phone numbers are exchanged.

Cool apartments soon to be Jaffa's hot commodity

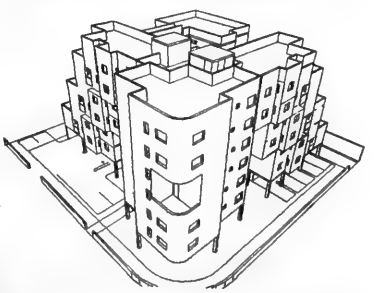
JAFFA — Architects have come up with a solution to the age-old apartment dweller's problem: how to avoid freezing in winter and broiling in summer.

Commissioned by the Israeli Ministry of Energy, architects from the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev have designed a six-storey apartment building that takes the sting out of Jaffa's fluctuating temperatures.

Natural ventilation, ceiling fans and dehydrators will let residents stay cool even in summer temperatures of 29ºC. Humidity in the coastal city hovers between 65 and 75 per cent.

Winter will be warmer with solar panels to trap heat. Solar energy is strong year-round in the city.

Construction of the 24-unit building has not yet begun.



Specially designed apartment block in Jaffa will keep residents cool in summer, warm in winter

N.Y. museum captures immigrants' lives

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Between 1880 and 1919, more than 23 million people emigrated to America.

Over 17 million landed on Ellis Island and many crowded into the melting pot of Manhattan's Lower East Side. First came the Germans and the Irish. They were succeeded by Russian, Romanian and Sephardic Jews who shared space with Italians. The tenement was the first home in America for many.

Built for the poor, these shabby 22-unit, six-storey walk-ups originally lacked water and indoor toilets. Heat came from coal and wood-burning stoves. Outside was a noisy, crowded world of push-carts and peddlers, inside a suffocating density.

Many an immigrant's impoverished son fought his way out of the ghetto to leave his mark on the arts and every other walk of life. Actors Edward G. Robinson and Sam Jaffe grew up here. So did Al Jolson, Eddie Cantor, Fanny Brice, George and Ira Gershwin, Mario Puzo and the Marx brothers. There have been Nobel and Pulitzer Prize winners. Their determination, perseverance and eventual success remain an inspiration.

Crowded in amongst its neighbors, one such tenement has resurfaced at 97 Orchard Street, as the centrepiece of Manhattan's Lower East Side Tenement Museum. After five years of planning, fundraising, research and renovation the museum curators have opened the largely unchanged house to daily tours.

"As far as I can tell, ours is the only museum devoted to what might be called urban pioneers," said Ruth J. Abram, president and founder of the museum. "There are wonderful places like Williamsburg that evoke and study the colonial past, there are any number of farm museums and reconstructed log cabins, but until we started planning some 10 years ago, there was nothing like this. Teams of historians have traced descendants of the original occupants and studied photographs, artifacts and diaries."

Abram and her small staff estimate that about 10,000 people from 20 nations lived in this 130-year-old building, boarded up since 1935.

There are fascinating immigrant stories from well-informed guides about how the residents struggled for a new life. You will be aghast at the cramped, windowless rooms, relieved only by a sculptured cornice.

On one darkened wall a sign reads: "Pants Made to Order $1.50." This tailor has written his inventory on a check-marked list: 50 skirts, 100 dresses, 25 jackets, 43 pants — conjuring up a picture of squinting workers in darkened sweat shop rooms. These swarming tenements were more densely crowded than the slums of Bombay (40 per cent of babies born here would die).

"The close quarters did not prevent tenants from taking boarders for $1.50 or $2 a week. It was one way for a poor family to raise the extra money that would enable it to move up in the world" said Abram.

"The Lower East Side was the symbol of absorption known all over the world, probably best known for the experience of the Jews who settled there," she adds. "But there are still all kinds of multi-ethnic people passing through. It remains an ongoing community. You can still experience the vitality of the dramatically crowded streets filled with the same dreams of America that enticed our ancestors. Now the faces are black, Latin and Oriental."

At 90 Orchard Street, across from the relic tenement, the museum operates a small shop, gallery and media room for visitors to further explore the continuing saga of tenement life.

'Evil partnership' alleged

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin launched a scathing attack last Sunday against Israel's opposition, accusing the radical right of being partners with Hamas.

"The radical right wing in Israel is dancing on the blood of the victims of the radical Islamic murderers, trying to turn these victims into a lever against the peace agreement," Rabin told a Labor Party committee meeting. "The fanatic murderers of the Islamic Jihad and Hamas are the means of the Israeli radical right wing."

Rabin charged that "there is an evil, wicked circle of partnership between the Hamas murderers and the radical right wing."

PLO leader visits Gaza Strip

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — "Death to Arafat" and "Rabin the traitor!" were the most strident cries heard in Israel during the visit of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat.

But outrage was just one response to an event that seemed unthinkable only a year ago.

While many Israelis expressed anger, others reacted to Arafat's visit with a kind of stoic resignation.

"It's the bitter medicine that you have to swallow in order to cure the disease," said one caller on an open line radio show. "Once we signed an agreement with the PLO, this visit was inevitable."

Others reacted with apathy.

"If he wanted to come, why did he have to do it during the world soccer match?" asked another caller.

And still others were utterly surprised. "Arafat here? I don't believe it," said Beatrice, a Tel Aviv beautician who had somehow missed the news.

At a massive rally in Jerusalem — organized by the right wing — there were as many cries against Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin as there were against Arafat; the mention of either leader's name triggered boos from the crowd.

The most striking feature of the demonstration was the homogeneous nature of the crowd: of the close to 100,000 people, nearly all were religious, many of them settlers from Judea and Samaria.

"I think it is clear from the turnout tonight that it is the religious Israelis who will safeguard the Jewish state," said Peretz, a 25-year-old yeshivah student from the settlement of Mavo Horon in Judea.

He, like many of the demonstrators, showed up "to protest the Rabin government policy."

The Likud organizers had hoped to use Arafat's visit to mobilize a wider segment of the Israeli population. Secular Israelis in particular were targeted.

"I drove through all the neighborhoods in Jerusalem for the last three days with a loudspeaker, urging people to come to the demonstration," says Likud party activist Matti Golan. "I'm disappointed with the poor showing of secular Israelis. I guess they're just apathetic."

The few secular Israelis who did show up — many happened to be at downtown cafes when the rally began — spoke, above all, of fear.

"If Arafat comes to Jerusalem, how will I let my children out of the house?" asked Victoria, a 40-year-old housewife.

"It's already frightening nowadays. If he comes to this city it'll be a disaster — a natural disaster, like an earthquake."

"We won't be able to sit in an outdoor cafe in downtown Jerusalem the way we do today," said David Sinai, a hospital technician. "We'll be too afraid to sit here with Arabs all around us. We must stop them before they turn Jerusalem into their capital.

"When I think about it, I feel a fire smouldering inside me," he added. "If this continues, I could kill someone. What Baruch Goldstein did will be nothing next to what I feel like doing."

Nearly all the demonstrators spoke of a sense of humiliation.

"It's a defeat for us," said Shuki, a Tel Aviv university student. "A humiliation."

Some, like settlement leader Uri Ariel, expressed outrage that an arch-terrorist would be treated like a VIP, instead of being tried for his crimes.

"In France, they tried the war criminal Paul Touvier 50 years after his acts. He was charged with killing seven Jews. How many more Jewish deaths are on Arafat's bloody hands?" asked Ariel.

On the other side of the cultural and political divide were Israelis who either supported Arafat's visit, or had at least come to terms with it.

With all the disgust I feel towards Arafat the man, and his terrible acts, I can't help but feel happy for the Palestinian people today," said Ravital Amitai. "It's a day for which they have waited so long."

"It's not a matter of feeling happy or not feeling happy," said Israeli writer A. B. Yehoshua. It's simply a stage in a process that we are pursuing."

A woman from Kiryat Shmona called an open line radio show to welcome the PLO leader.

"I support his visit because we have suffered enough from katyusha rockets," she said. "I want peace and quiet — at almost any price."

A few longtime left-wing activists like journalist Uri Avineri even met with the PLO leader. But most simply expressed quiet acceptance of the new reality.

"Those who feel that Arafat's visit is a humiliation to us are living in an old reality," argued Israeli writer David Grossman. "Under that reality one side's gain is another side's loss. But since September 1993, it is no longer a situation of 'them or us.' Today it is them and us."

Other commentators agreed that through his visit, Arafat has tied his fate to that of Rabin and to the accord they signed.

But even among those who support the agreement with the PLO, Arafat's visit did not evoke a fraction of the excitement and drama of Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat's historic visit 17 years ago.

Jerusalem 'mission' on standby

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Thomas Hecht, a Canadian Jewish community leader, has confirmed that a "mission" of Canadian Jews is being planned to fly to Jerusalem to protest, if PLO chairman Yasser Arafat visits the holy city.

Hecht said he will be coordinating the trip with Abe Foxman, executive vice-president of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) in New York.

Foxman was not available for comment, but Ken Jacobson, ADL's assistant national director, told The CJN that "if all Arafat is going to do is come to the holy places [to pray] — while we would prefer that he didn't — we would not engage in a protest."

"It is not a private citizen going to pray," counters Hecht. "Arafat is a political personage. Whatever he does is a political move."

Hecht denied a June 28 Israel Radio report that a Canadian jumbo jet had already been secured to fly a Canadian Jewish group to Israel.

"I'm waiting to receive the signal from [Jerusalem mayor] Ehud Olmert," Hecht told The CJN late last week. "The logistics are not yet in place."

But he promised that a delegation of Jews from major Canadian cities would be there "should he [Arafat] come to Jerusalem down the road."

Early last week Olmert launched a campaign to prevent Arafat from visiting Jerusalem. The former Likud health minister called together all eight of his deputy mayors in response to recent statements by Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin that Arafat has the same right as any other Muslim to come to Jerusalem to pray.

An already bitter dispute exists in Israel regarding Arafat's stated intention of coming to Jerusalem to pray at the Al Aksa Mosque, Islam's third holiest shrine.

Olmert's plan to fly in protesters from the Diaspora is part of his stated goal of bringing "a million demonstrators" onto the streets of Jerusalem if Arafat attempts to visit.

Hecht said he hoped to include the participation of Canadian Jewish "leaders" in the trip and said he has

Legion fails to secure funds for housing

'Insult' to veterans

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thirteen years after setting the wheels in motion for a new 98-unit retirement home, the Royal Canadian Legion's General Wingate branch 256 is again awaiting a response from the Ontario Ministry of Housing after applying for funding for the third time.

"When it comes to funding, it seems that veterans are at the bottom of the totem pole," Sol Raibmon, first vice-president of Wingate branch, told The CJN. "A more worthy project or a more viable one — more needed — I am not aware of."

"We really need these premises very badly," said Syd Sears, building chair. "The average veteran is 70, and a lot of them are 80," he said, adding that the non-profit project has a waiting list of over 250 names.

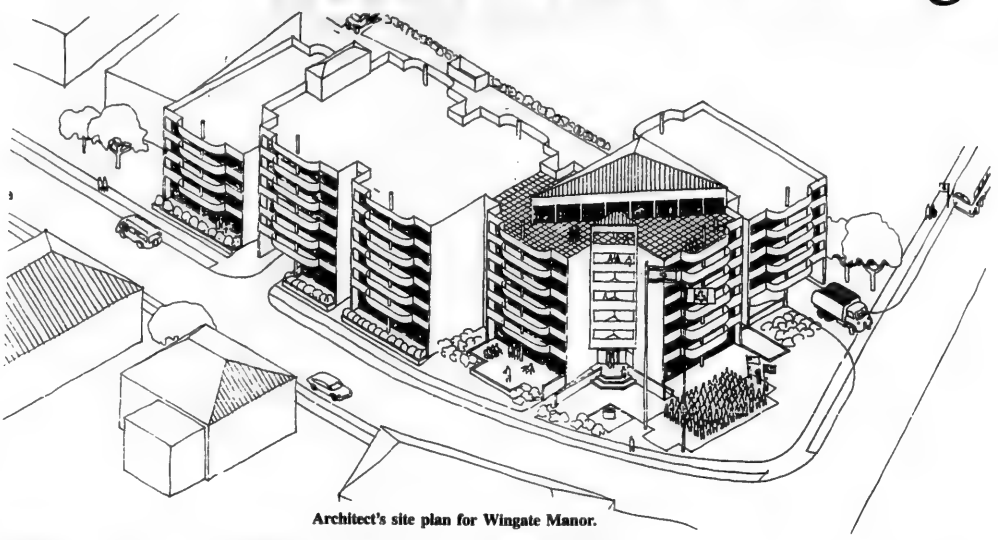
Wingate Manor is envisioned as low-rise housing for veterans and other seniors who are self-sufficient, although plans include a 24-hour-a-day attendant in case of emergency. Recreation areas and new quarters for the branch will also be included, and the building will be wheelchair accessible, said Raibmon.

The Wingate branch, with close to 300 members, is one of six Jewish or mainly Jewish branches of the Legion across Canada. Their current premises are located over a store in the Eglinton-Bathurst area.

The project meets all government requirements, said Raibmon. He considers it "an insult" that the government has seen fit to fund non-profit housing on the Toronto Islands but not the veterans' project. "There's no shopping, no facilities [on the Islands]," said Raibmon. "They have to put in special sewers.

"We already have a property which has been rezoned. It's in an area for elderly people. There's a bus stop at our front door. There's adequate sewage. It's a phenomenal location," said Raibmon.

Raibmon said the veterans' project has the support of a dozen politicians, one of whom, Monte Kwinter, MPP for Wilson Heights, stated recently in the Legislative Assembly that the government's "stalling" is "an unmitigated disgrace."



Architect's site plan for Wingate Manor.

The project dates back to 1981, when branch members formed a housing committee. After meeting with lawyers, architects and elected officials, they learned that a suitable site was necessary to successfully apply for funding. The next nine years were devoted to searching for the ideal spot.

A .9-acre site was optioned on the southwest corner of Rajah Street and Neptune Drive in 1990. The next step was application for rezoning, which was approved by the City Council of North York in 1993.

Wingate branch submitted its first formal application for funding under the federal/provincial housing program in April 1992. Both that application and a subsequent one under Wave 1 of the Jobs Ontario Homes program were unsuccessful. A third funding application, under Wave 2 of the program, is currently under consideration.

The Ministry of Housing is expected to make an announcement by late summer regarding funding allocations, said George Hough, a policy adviser for the ministry.

Hough, who was on the interview team that met with the veterans in April, told The CJN that the ministry's Central Region/Metro Toronto office — which encompasses a wide-ranging geographic area including Peterborough, Owen Sound and Bracebridge — has received over 300 applications similar to that from Wingate branch.

The 300 applications represent a total of over 30,000 individual housing units, and only 2,700 can be funded, said Hough. He explained that the ministry is "filling a gap" left by the federal government when its non-profit funding program was cancelled two years ago.

"Having an acceptable application does not mean you will get a project," said Hough. "If you take a driving exam and pass, you get your licence. That's not the case with the Ministry of Housing. There's no way the government of Ontario has the money."

Harmony aims to unite groups

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — During the debate in the media about the Royal Canadian Legion's recent controversial decision to ban religious headgear in legion halls, one of the comments made was "it's us versus them," according to a co-chair of the new Harmony Movement.

"That was played across the airways, and for me it was a seminal moment in this country where we have to decide 'Is it us versus them or are we all one?' I came down squarely on the side of 'we are all one,' " said Gordon Cressy. "And we are all immigrants to this place."

Cressy, a past chairman of the board of the National Council of YMCA Canada, spoke at the group's recent official launch held in Metro Hall. He was joined by co-chairs Mary Anne Chambers, a member of the governing council of the University of Toronto, and Dr. Joseph Wong, the honorary chair of the United Way of Greater Toronto.

Harmony was founded by volunteers as a direct response to what Cressy calls "the apparent deterioration of quality of life in Canada." Supported by donations, the non-partisan organization plans public education and awareness campaigns, along with special events; the goal is to increase appreciation of Canadians' common values and of contributions made by all cultural groups.

Cressy said Harmony stands for bringing people together. "If we don't want in the latter part of this decade to be driven by the sense of just fear and the need for bigger locks and bigger security systems, then we will have to do it in the sense of rebuilding community... And many organizations have been part of that for a long time, and continue to be. What I think Harmony does is add another voice to that, and in effect piggybacks on the good work that is already occurring."

Elie Wiesel is congratulated by McGill University chancellor Gretta Chambers after receiving an honorary Doctor of Letters degree. [Stuart John Tigchelaar-Marasport Inc. photo]

Wiesel gets honorary doctorate

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Elie Wiesel accepted an honorary doctorate from McGill University recently, delivering a heartfelt appeal to graduating arts and science students to resist "indifference and complacency" by confronting the forces of fanaticism sweeping the world.

Garbed in cap and gown at Place des Arts' Salle Wilfrid Peltier, the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize laureate accepted the honorary degree — his 73rd — from Barry Levy, chair of the university's Jewish Studies program.

While the 65-year-old Wiesel adopted a characteristically sombre cadence in his commencement address, he also found room for humor. He called the students' studies "four years of hard work — I hope — and occasional fooling around."

But the main thrust of his remarks was reserved for the theme of fanaticism, which he described as the planet's "real peril," one that the students' generation will have to face.

"Fanaticism is always dangerous: when it acquires power, it is mortal," warned Wiesel, who also punctuated his speech with comments in French.

"Fanaticism — be it religious or ethnically, racially motivated — is by definition irrational," Wiesel said. "A human product, it cannot be stopped by men alone. In religion, fanaticism hides God's face; in politics, it destroys human freedom."

Wiesel warned that "no people may consider itself immune against its poison, no community is protected from its arrows.

"I belong to a generation that has witnessed the defeat of Nazism and the abdication of communism, but not the disappearance of fanaticism that is characteristic of both."

Wiesel cited the tragedies in Bosnia, Rwanda, Somalia and Kashmir, among others, as testifying to the fact that human life continues to be devalued.

But Wiesel also held out hope. While human history "is made of failings and failures," he said, "it is also a carrier of human miracles.

"Isn't South Africa a maginificent case in point," he asked rhetorically. "Isn't the Israeli-Palestinian peace process proof that one must never give up hope?

"Oh, I know: there are problems, there may be many more," he said. "Still, better peace with problems than war which remains the ultimate, most cruelly grotesque problem."

Wiesel hoped his audience will find answers to the questions he finds unanswerable. Among them: how the generation of the '30s and '40s in Europe "endowed evil with such force, and the victims with such sadness. Why wasn't Hitler stopped earlier? He could have been," Wiesel said.

"Why did no one warn Hungarian Jews already in 1944, not to let themselves be shipped to what was then called an unknown destination?

"Where did young Jewish rebels find weapons and courage, and military knowledge, to fight what was then the mightiest army in Europe?

"How did survivors manage to keep their sanity? And what about their faith? One cannot conceive [of] Auschwitz neither with nor without God: what was His role in the total collapse of moral vision and will?

Wiesel said the questions illustrate fundamental issues that challenge the humanity in the human being.

"Will you," he asked the students, "find the answers that escape me and my peers now?"

Missing Israeli Soldiers Coalition launches fundraising campaign

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The newly-formed International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers (ICMIS) has launched a Canadian fundraising campaign.

Their goal is to promote action by the Israel government to secure release of or information about three missing-in-action (MiA) soldiers believed to be held as prisoners in Syria. They have been missing since the 1982 Lebanese war.

Miriam Baumel, an American who made aliyah and lives in Jerusalem, is the mother of one of the MiAs, Zachary Baumel. The other two are Yehuda Katz and Zvi Feldman.

Miriam Baumel enlisted the aid of the Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region during a recent visit here, to help publicize her allegations that the Israel government is not making any effort to get the missing soldiers freed as part of the current negotiations. She organized the ICMIS to promote international awareness of the situation and to campaign for funds to help the organization hold protest demonstrations and rallies and to conduct advertising campaigns in the Israel media.

Baumel told The CJN she also plans to campaign in Winnipeg, Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal, as well as in the United States.

She said her Ottawa interview which appeared in The CJN in February, resulted in a demonstration in front of the Iranian embassy. But she doesn't understand why the demonstrators singled out Iran, rather than Syria. The soldiers were captured in the Bekaa Valley in Syria and, she says, under the terms of the Geneva Convention of 1949, which Syria signed, prisoners of war are the responsibility of the government of the place in which they were last seen. The fact that they may have been in the hands of a Palestinian group "in no way lessens Syrian legal and moral responsibility for the welfare of the soldiers."

Baumel told The CJN that as part of the Declaration of Principles signed last year in Washington by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat, the PLO leader promised to arrange the release of the men "but he hasn't delivered on the promise."

She claims the Israel government is not interested in pressing the case "over a few missing soldiers because it doesn't want to upset Arafat."

She said Israel still has 4,000 Palestinian prisoners and claims 87½ per cent of the Israeli public wants them held until Syria and Arafat reveal the whereabouts of the MiAs.

She added that the suspense of not knowing the fate of the soldiers is terrible and that Israeli soldiers have said, "We're not afraid to die in action — but we worry about being captured because we know the strain on our families would be tremendous."

Other parents have also been campaigning to get the government to find out about their sons, but the situation really exploded when Arafat's promise failed to materialize, and the government and defence officials gave them the runaround.

The first physical trace of the MiAs, said Baumel, was obtained by Israel in 1984. It was a wax impression of Zachary Baumel's identification tag. Jordan's Princess Dina, whose husband was a high ranking PLO official being held in Israel, presented the wax impression of the tag to an Israeli journalist, but this was not followed through, she said.

FINE FOODS AND CATERERS

TO OUR VALUED CUSTOMERS

We will be revising the format of our Eglinton Avenue store due to construction of the new Eglinton Ave. W. subway line scheduled to begin in August.

We are informed that construction will severely disrupt parking and pedestrian access on Eglinton from the Allen Road to Old Park Road for a period of up to 3 years.

In response, we are pleased to advise you effective Saturday, July 16 our store at 1114 Eglinton Ave. W. will be changing to serve you better.

Our CATERING division will continue in high gear and we will be introducing an expanded special order service for pick up and delivery in order that our customers can continue to enjoy all their favourite Chapman's foods.

Orders can be picked up at the store front on Eglinton until such time as access becomes too disrupted. At that time, we will be expediting orders through the laneway entrance off Glenarden or Old Park Rd. We will keep you informed of these changes as far in advance as possible

Although we are experiencing our first summer heat wave, we remind you that the High Holidays are very early (September 5th), and Labour Day Weekend is only 2 months away! REMEMBER TO PLACE YOUR ORDERS EARLY!

We wish you all a very safe, happy and healthy summer.

Peace process seen as irreversible

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — There's no turning back in the peace process; the alternative is another war and Israelis don't want another war, according to Avner Regev.

The new executive director of the Jewish National Fund of Canada, Regev succeeds Morris Zilka who held the position for five years and is returning to Israel.

Regev is a columnist for a Hebrew daily newspaper and teaches at the Hebrew University; he is regarded as an expert on Arab-Jewish relations and has been serving as an advisor to Israel Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Regev was in Victoria on a get-acquainted visit, following similar visits to Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver and Toronto; he was to visit Winnipeg after leaving the West Coast.

In an interview with The CJN, Regev said that if proper security arrangements are in place, Israel will give the Golan Heights back to Syria. In Rabin's opinion, he said, there's no way to get peace with Syria without giving back the Golan.

Regev doubted recent reports that Jordan would soon sign a peace treaty with Israel on its own — it can do so only with the approval of Syria, he declared.

But Regev was emphatic that Jerusalem will never again be a divided city, although he conceded that a borough system might be devised in due course under which Palestinians could develop their own area in the city.

He said that when the Labor government was elected two years ago, it decided the political agenda had to change. "We couldn't continue to endure the way we were living and agreed that change was urgent."

That, he explained, was why Rabin decided on dealing with "Arafat and his gang" and will continue the peace process with responsible Palestinians leaders even if Arafat doesn't turn up in Gaza or Jericho.

Regev now writes his column, mainly on Israeli-Arab affairs, twice a week and plans to continue the column at least once a week.

JNF not a charity

He thinks the settlers in the Palestinian areas will eventually be encouraged by the government to leave for Israel.

Regev agrees with the philosophy expressed by the deputy foreign minister, Yossi Beilin, that Israel doesn't want to continue receiving charity from the Diaspora. He noted that Beilin had even suggested at the recent World Zionist Organization- Jewish Agency meeting in Jerusalem that the Jewish Agency could be disbanded if the Diaspora, especially the United States, wants to use Israel as a fundraising tool but keep most of the money in the country for "Jewish continuity."

But he stressed that the Jewish National Fund (JNF) is not a charity and has always campaigned separately. The land of Israel belongs to all Jews and the JNF regards itself as a trustee for the Jewish people.

Regev reported that close to 75 per cent of the JNF budget is invested directly in the land. Land development, reclamation, management, research and development, and afforestation are all part of the program. In addition, JNF conducts a variety of educational activities for local and overseas youth, including five summer camps. The Diaspora focus is to strengthen ties with Israel.

A native of Haifa, the child of Latvian Jews, Regev was educated in Jerusalem and graduated from Hebrew University in political science. He served in the reserve, winding up as a major, and then moved on to work in the defence department, security section.

He said he is keenly interested in politics and accepted the Canadian posting with some reluctance. However he was nominated by the Labor government and has the full approval of the JNF of Canada board.

He will be returning to Israel shortly to bring back his wife and young daughter and will be living in Cote St. Luc. He has another older daughter and son who will remain in Israel.

Regev was accompanied to Victoria by Gideon Shavit, the Jerusalem emissary to British Columbia. He met with Victoria JNF leaders at the home of David and April Katz, who have been the JNF representatives for several years. They are turning over their duties to Sherry and Robbie Sheffman.

It's expected the third Negev Dinner will be held here in April next year. The honoree has not yet been selected.

Baron Byng class of '39 holds reunion

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

TREADWELL, Ont. — They broke out spontaneously into songs they sang in high school, spirited pieces like Land of Hope and Glory, and no one fluffed the words.

Not bad for people who graduated 55 years ago from the fabled Baron Byng High School (BBHS) on Montreal's St. Urbain Street.

But then again, not many people learned how to sing operas in the high school choir under the formidable D.M. Herbert.

The class of 1939, now in their 70s, got together last month at the country home of prominent Ottawa real estate developer Solly Goldfarb and his wife Edna.

Most of the class still lives in Montreal, but Ben Mendel made the trip from Toronto, and Lily Kligman Cohen came in from Rancho Mirage, Calif.

The 154 graduates of 1939 were all Jewish. They lived within the old Jewish quarter marked by Pine Avenue, St. Viateur Street, Park Avenue and St. Denis Street.

For the most part their Yiddish-speaking parents were of modest means, but had big hopes for their children. In those days, a Grade 11 student paid $5 a month to attend school. Keeping a child in high school was difficult for many families.

"It was a home away from home," said Max Shainblum. "I lived less than two blocks away from school, but I never went home for lunch; I just wanted to be there. We were very attached to it and each other."

The class of '39 came to maturity at a time when many doors were closed to Jews and anti-Semitic sentiment was openly expressed.

Strong bonds

These factors helped to forge bonds strong enough to endure to this day. Reunion organizer Ed Wolkove, an accountant, said he has lost track of only 17 of his 154 classmates.

They also helped produce a group successful in their professions, material comforts and in service to society.

Among them are former Steinberg executive Mel Dobrin; Michael Fainstat, former chair of the Montreal Urban Community executive; journalist Abe Arnold; and artist Sylvia Ary.

There were six physicians, a dentist, at least eight PhDs in the sciences and math, six full professors and several accountants and engineers.

A number of women went on to careers in law — Bella Lerman was appointed a judge — and science, like the late Bertha Singer. Boys and girls were segregated in those days.

The class of '39 graduated on the eve of World War II. About 70 per cent of the males enlisted in the Armed Forces, and two — Joe Gertel and Willie Berger — were killed in action.

After the war many of the ex-servicemen went to university on the veterans' bill. Before that, a college education was the privilege of the elite, they said.

"Not only was the cost [of university] formidable, but Jewish students were required to attain an average of 75 per cent (at high school graduation), in contrast to the usual entrance requirement of 65 per cent at McGill," said Sam Levy, a PhD in biochemistry still working at the Queen Elizabeth Hospital.

Quota system

"In medicine, a quota system was openly in effect, allowing Jewish students only 10 per cent of the places in the entrance class," Levy said.

Levy gives much credit to BBHS teachers for inspiring their students to achieve, teachers like Herbert, Anne Savage (art) and the principal, Dr. J.S. Astbury. "Their influence on our lives was immeasurable," he said.

There were no Jewish teachers at the time.

The 55th reunion was the seventh in 30 years. As time passes and the ranks gets thinner and frailer, the reunions have become more frequent.

Following custom, the names of the 26 deceased classmates were read out at the Treadwell reunion. This was followed by the happy news that one teacher is still alive and living in British Columbia — 100-year-old Mr. Saunders.

"The class of '39 was perhaps the most successful one in the remarkable history of Baron Byng," Levy said. "Our sense of justice, compassion, comradeship and cultural identity with our people is perhaps stronger than in others who did not have the good fortune to attend the old school.

"Many former students of BBHS feel their heart beat faster and a tear forming as they pass by that venerable old building on St. Urbain Street.

"Those were good times."

Palestinian expectations high as Arafat visits Gaza Strip

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

GAZA CITY — As anticipation mounted in Gaza City just hours before the arrival of PLO leader Yasser Arafat, a rumor began to circulate. "Abu Jihad is alive," people whispered. "And Arafat is going to bring him."

To most Palestinians, Abu Jihad — the PLO leader who was gunned down in Tunis in 1988 — is regarded with nearly the same sense of awe as Arafat himself.

The belief that Arafat could bring his associate back to life shows the kind of supernatural expectations that some Palestinians had of their leader on the eve of his arrival.

If there were those who conjured up such fantastic scenarios, others had much more concrete ideas of what they wanted from Arafat.

"Work," said one. "That's what we need most of all in Gaza."

"Arafat's visit is important to us psychologically. But the economy is in very bad shape. I hope he'll announce new projects and jobs," said Jamal, a 40-year-old Gazan, who is trained as an electrician, but has never found work in his field.

"I use my certificate to decorate the wall," he says wryly.

So anxious are Gazans to improve their economic situation that no idea is dismissed — not even that formerly proposed by Ariel Sharon, the Israeli commander who dealt a crushing blow to Gazan terrorists in the late sixties.

"You know Sharon had a plan to turn Gaza into an industrial area," noted Ataf, a 21-year-old student from Jabalya refugee camp. "Maybe Arafat can do that now. I believe it's possible to make a paradise out of hell."

"He is not coming with the staff of Moses," countered Abed El Hamid Kahlut. "He's just an ordinary man."

Nevertheless Kahlut had his own long list of demands for Arafat. "The streets in Gaza are rotten; the youth don't work, the people aren't educated. There are no good schools or hospitals. We are looking to Arafat to find a solution to these problems."

During morning prayers on July 1, the spiritual leader of a Hamas-affiliated mosque referred to Arafat indirectly in his sermon, hinting at his imminent arrival and welcoming the leader, recalls Kahlut, one of the worshippers.

It marked a striking change from the calls for Arafat's death commonly heard at Hamas gatherings only a few months ago.

This was perhaps one of the most surprising aspects of the PLO leader's visit: the little opposition it sparked among rival Palestinian factions. Hamas did issue a statement condemning the visit. But the brother of the jailed Hamas leader in Gaza met with Arafat.

Circus atmosphere greets PLO chief

Black flags were hoisted on a few homes as a sign of mourning. But they could hardly be seen amidst the collection of flashy banners, PLO flags and posters of Arafat that turned dusty refugee camps into circuses for a day. There were no counter demonstrations. And no assassination attempts.

"He is the symbol of our struggle," said Ataf, echoing a phrase heard again and again in Gaza.

If the meek opposition to the visit says something about Arafat's unrivalled status, it also attests to a certain erosion of support for the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas in the Gaza Strip, stronghold of the movement.

A few weeks ago, English-language Hamas slogans were scrawled across the walls in Gaza City. "It's for the media," explained a resident. "I guess Hamas doesn't want to waste its efforts on the local population."

Kahlut, a former Fatah fighter, says that his own son is active in Hamas.

"He was attracted to the group because of the Israeli occupation," says Kahlut. "But he has changed his opinion since the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza. He used to say that our religion forbids us to talk of peace. Now he talks of building a society, of all the work there is for us to do.

"My son is still in Hamas," he adds. "But I don't think he'll stay with the organization for more than another month or two. Now, for the first time in years, he goes to school regularly and he thinks of his future in a different way. It's a new situation.

"If they build a sports centre here, says Kahlut, "he'll have someplace to go after school and then Hamas will have nothing at all to offer him."

As the tens of thousands of spectators filed out of the square where Arafat had just finished speaking, the atmosphere was calm. There were no volleys of machine gun fire. No ecstatic cries. No stampedes. He didn't whip the crowd into a frenzy.

"He said something to please everyone," said one spectator.

"Yes," piped in another. "He called for the release of the prisoners. He stretched out his hand to Hamas and to Rabin. He thanked King Hussein and President [Hosni] Mubarak. He didn't forget any point — except maybe the most important one — the economy."

'Concerned Canadian Jews' ready to fly to Jerusalem

received "signals" from several that they would be prepared to participate.

Hecht did not agree, however, that such a trip could be perceived as being in opposition to the Israeli government, even though Rabin has indicated that Arafat is free to come and pray in the city.

It will not be a trip revolving "around party lines," Hecht promised. "It will be a trip of concerned Canadian Jews.

"We do not want anybody in Jerusalem who has designs on the city."

A secondary purpose of joining such a protest, Hecht said, would be to "hold the government to its original statement that Jerusalem is the capital of the state.

"We want to make the statement that peace comes from security and not security from peace," he said

A visit to Jerusalem by Arafat, Hecht said, would constitute the "first step in conditioning the world that there is an Arab dimension to Jerusalem.

"We want to dispel that [myth] forever," he said. "Jerusalem is the City of David."

Ornan Yekutieli of Meretz, a leader of the opposition in Jerusalem city council, said that Olmert's plans lent credence to Palestinian fears that free access to Jerusalem holy sites might be denied.

Deputy Mayor Shmuel Meir, part of the stop-Arafat campaign, told Israel Radio he feared the police might close off Jerusalem some days before any projected Arafat visit and thus ensure a capital city that was free of all demonstrators.

Meir also promised that on the day of a planned Arafat visit, Jerusalem would come to a total standstill. He added that torches of protest would be lit throughout the city and in other towns supporting the struggle.

Israeli protesters slam Arafat and Rabin

"Sadat's arrival was tremendous," recalled Itai Eren, a 37-year-old from Tel Aviv who supports Rabin's peace policy.

"It's difficult now to sense even an inkling of the sensation Israelis had then," he said. "When Egypt, the most powerful Arab country, was ready to sign a peace treaty with Israel it was like a dream come true. But Arafat's arrival? It's like getting rid of a pimple — something that has lingered on and on . . . something about which no one gives a damn any more."

For Palestinians, Gaza seemed an appropriate place for Arafat's historic return, since he has family there and is even rumored to have been born there himself. A true "homecoming."

For Israelis, too, Gaza (called "Aza" in Hebrew) was an appropriate place for Arafat's entrance. With its squalor and teeming refugee camps, it is a place that nearly all Israelis simply want to be rid of.

And in that spirit, the most widely-expressed wish for the PLO leader was that he "go to Aza" — a play on the Hebrew word aza-zel (which means hell).

Israel-Jordan border undergoing change

To be handed over from military to civilian control

Administration at the Allenby Bridge will soon be handed over to civilian control.

LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

ALLENBY BRIDGE — Hundreds of travellers wait in line for hours under a scorching sun.

Eventually they make their way to the front of the line and enter the terminal where, one by one, their luggage is searched by soldiers.

The scene is always the same at the Allenby Bridge where as many as 10,000 people a day — most of them Palestinians, some of them visitors from neighboring Arab countries — cross the border between Israel and Jordan.

But in three months time, crossing the Allenby Bridge will be more like arriving at Ben-Gurion Airport. At least, that is what Transport Minister Israel Kessar said during a tour of the bridge last month.

In October, the border crossing situated a few kilometres east of Jericho will be transformed from a military outpost into a civilian one, as it is handed over from the Civil Administration to the Israeli Transport Ministry. At the same time, close to 30 million shekels ($10 million US) is being injected into this crossing and the one at Rafiah (on the Egyptian border) to turn both into modern, efficient facilities. With the introduction of automated equipment, long lines under the sun should become a thing of the past.

"We want these border crossings to meet international standards and be at least the same levels as what we have at Ben-Gurion Airport," said Kessar.

The facelift comes in the wake of the Cairo agreement. The May 4 accord calls for far-reaching changes at both border crossings, to "reflect the new reality created by the Declaration of Principles."

The withdrawal of the Israeli army from the Jericho region is part of that "new reality" and was the impetus for transferring the Allenby Bridge from military to civilian hands. The bridge will now be run, like all other border crossings in Israel, by the Ports Authority — with one difference. Representatives of the Palestinian Authority will also have a role in administering both the Allenby border crossing and the Rafiah one, which is in the Gaza Strip.
